Mr. SARGENT. I ask leave of the Senate to present with a little care an important petition from certain of my constituents. I will not occupy its time long, but I should like to have the Senate understand the grounds of the relief for which the petitioners pray. Like many of the memorials from California it is addressed to the delegations in both Houses, and it commences:

The undersigned, your immediate constituents, would respectfully represent that we are residents of the town of Truckee and of other places near the summit of the Sierra Nevada Mountains, or are engaged in business at such places; that we are citizens of the United States; that we were formerly residents of Maine, New Hampshire, Wisconsin, and Michigan, and other timber States of this Union; that most of us were educated to the business of logging and of cutting up timber by saw-mills.

We would further represent that when the grant was made to the Central Pacific Railroad Company many of us were induced to take contracts for the supplying of ties, bridge-timber, and other timber and wood necessary in the construction of that road; that we were informed that the act making the grant to the railroad company gave the privilege to said company and employees to take timber, wood, stone, or other material for said construction from any of the public lands of the United States.

That was a provision of that legislation.

Under contracts with this company some of us erected saw-mills and supplied the timber necessary for the construction of said road; that there was required and used in such construction, and in the erection of about forty miles of snow-sheds, an amount of timber estimated at about three hundred millions of feet; that there has been required to keep said road in repair and to rebuild the snow-sheds an amount of timber annually of about twenty millions of feet; that all this timber has been supplied from the slopes of the said Sierra Nevada Mountains. Before the road was completed, the silver mines of Nevada were so far developed as to require for timbering seventy millions of feet of square timber annually.

The construction of the road through Nevada and Utah developed other mines, which required, in addition, six millions of feet annually. Besides this, Nevada not being a timber State, all the supplies of lumber for the construction of towns in that State also came from the Sierra Nevadas. When, by the completion of the railroad, the right to cut timber on public lands for the purpose of construction ceased, the undersigned, and others interested in the lumber trade, applied to our Representatives in Congress for the passage of some act under which we might obtain title and pay the Government for these timber lands, so as to obtain sufficient quantity to continue our business and supply the necessities of this section of the country. We found that there was no way under the law to obtain title to timber lands except under the pre-emption and homestead laws, and these were understood as designed especially for settlers whose object is to cultivate the land. But the soil at this great elevation in the Sierra Nevadas is unfitted for agricultural purposes, and is covered each year for more than six months by snow. An attempt, therefore, to take such lands under the pre-emption or homestead law would be a delusion and a fraud, and a possible premium on perjury. We therefore petitioned our Representatives in Congress for the passage of some law by which title could be obtained legitimately to these lands, so that, as law-abiding and loyal citizens, we might pursue our occupations, build up our homes, establish churches and schools, and train our children in habits of industry, loyalty, and virtue.

All our efforts were in vain. No such law was passed.

I should like to say upon that matter that a bill answering the desire of these petitioners passed the House in the Forty-first Congress and again in the Forty-third Congress, and the identical bill passed the Senate in the Forty-fourth Congress; so that each House has once passed a bill for the relief of these parties and one House has passed it twice. A bill similar in its provisions, almost identical with it, I have introduced at the present session and sent to the Committee on Public Lands.

Still, being desirous of following our occupations, (the greater portion of the undersigned being unfitted for any other,) some of us purchased portions of the odd-numbered sections of timber land granted to the railroad company, and supplied the annual demand from this resource. When the act known as the "soldiers' additional homestead act" was passed many of us, in good faith, invested in the purchase of these claims a great portion of our means, and caused the same to be located on the lands contained in even-numbered sections, which, in many cases, were lands adjoining those we had purchased from the railroad company.

After some months, when the papers relating to these additional homesteads reached the General Land Office at Washington, the parties making the locations of these claims learned to their dismay that most of them were fraudulent, and that they had been swindled out of the money invested in them. Those of us who are lumbermen have also found that there has been a grievous misapprehension as to the rights of pre-emptors and homestead settlers in the matter of cutting and removing timber from the lands on which they have settled. It is charged that in some instances these settlers have cut and removed timber from these claims and sold the same to the proprietors of the saw-mills, and that these purchasers are responsible for the alleged violation of law on the part of the settler. The settler may have acted in good faith, supposing he had the right to the timber. We do not charge the fact to be otherwise; but we do say that those of us who bought the timber understood that the settler owned the land and timber, and had the right to sell the same. We certainly acted in good faith, and without any intention of violating any law of the United States. We find, however, that under a strict construction of the law, and without a full knowledge of all the facts, the grand jury of the United States, sitting at San Francisco, has indicted some of us for cutting, and causing to be cut, and removing, and causing to be removed, timber from these lands of the United States.

The indictments in these cases appear to be founded on section 2461 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, and under section 4751 of the same statutes the severe pecuniary penalties denounced by the former action are to be distributed, one-half to the informer and the other half to the Navy pension fund. This great inducement to the informer is believed to be at the bottom of this prosecution, and, if permitted to further direct the action of the Government in these and other cases, must necessarily ruin thousands of industrious, law-abiding people, for the benefit of a system of espionage foreign to the principles of our form of government.

Now, although we had no knowledge of any violation of law, and certainly no intention to deal with parties that had committed trespass or violated the law, we are nevertheless, under these indictments, liable to imprisonment and to pay fines aggregating a half million of dollars, and, in addition to this, subject to civil suits for the value of the timber cut. These indictments have paralyzed all business in the mountains. If pressed it will stop the business of mining in Nevada, stop the construction of dwellings, mills, and other structures in the State of Nevada and Utah, and involve all classes in a general ruin. If title to timber lands on the Sierras cannot be obtained except by pre-emption, and the seeming perjury necessary to take the same as agricultural lands, this section of the Union must revert to its original state of barbarism.

If we are to be fined and imprisoned, our mills and logging teams confiscated, leaving our wives and children to starve in their cabins in the snow in the Sierras, because our Government will not provide the means by which a necessary, honest, and legitimate business may be pursued and the improvement and development of the country continued, we can only regret our fate, and hope that the next generation may be blessed with more enlightened legislation. With honest intentions, as law-abiding citizens, with wives and children looking to us for support and maintenance, cheerfully paying all taxes and assessments for the support of the Government of the United States, the State, and county, and readily contributing to the support of churches and schools for the advancement of morals and the upholding of civilization, in good faith believing we were complying with the law and acting legitimately, we have engaged in our various pursuits.

Some of us have invested our money in good faith and with a desire to acquire title to some of these timber lands, and what is the result? We have been defrauded out of most of the money so invested; we have been indicted for an alleged violation of law; ruin stares us in the face; the stigma of offenders against the laws of the United States threatens to attach to our names and to the names of our children.

We do not know where to turn for relief from this great wrong but to you. We therefore ask that you will cause a special act to be immediately passed for relief, not merely for us individually, but for this community and its important interests, providing, in substance, that the open timber lands on the Sierra Nevada Mountains be duly segregated, and that those of us who may desire be allowed to purchase the same at a reasonable price; that the parties indicted or subject to be indicted for trespass on said lands may, upon any trial for such offense, whether civil or criminal, be allowed to show that they have entered and paid for such lands, and that the receipt of the proper officer of the Government showing such payment shall be a bar to further proceedings, and such cases shall thereupon be dismissed.

We further ask that in all cases where other claims, under the present laws of the United States, have so far intervened as to vest title in others than those who have committed trespass, that the parties committing such trespass shall be allowed to settle all liabilities by the payment to the Government of a reasonable stumpage, not exceeding the acreage price of the land.

Mr. President, this is really a very hard case. It appeals to the justice and sympathies of Congress. These men have tried for years to buy this land. Under a mistaken policy, Congress supposing it could be taken up under the pre-emption and homestead laws, both Houses have neglected at the same time to pass a bill for their relief. We passed a bill authorizing an additional soldiers' homestead. They invested their money in those claims only to find they had been swindled out of it and that the claims were fraudulent. They tried to take them under the pre-emption and homestead laws and were refused in that. Their industry has supplied the timber necessary to carry on the great mines. The Bonanza mines would shut down to-morrow if it were not for this industry. The Bonanza mines, with their shafts and drifts two thousand feet deep, hold up with their solid timbering Mount Davidson as Atlas was fabled to hold up the earth. The timbers, as large and square as these desks, are put close together in the worked-out drifts, layer on layer, but so great is the pressure of the overhanging mountain that these solid layers of timber are ground to powder, and shafts are closed up unless constantly retimbered. The working of these great mines would have to be entirely abandoned if they could not obtain the timber from the Sierra Nevada Mountains. The only way they can obtain it is through this milling industry.

Furthermore, all the farming industry, all the residences throughout the mountains, and I might say those in San Francisco and throughout the State, are supplied by this industry. It is an actual necessity for the existence of the State and for the existence of the State of Nevada, at any rate as a mining community.

Now, they have exhausted every possible means in their power by appealing to Congress for their relief. A bill answering their purposes, paying the Government the highest price it had ever charged for land, is now before the Committee on Public Lands of the Senate, and I do hope, I do plead, that the prayer of these men may be granted, and that they may be relieved upon the payment of the acreage price of the land from this prosecution which they could not avoid for pursuing an industry which they supposed they had a right to carry on. They are indicted under peculiar circumstances, relieving them certainly from the charge of being timber thieves or plunderers, because they supposed that where a man took up the land under pre-emption he had a right to clear it for the purpose of tillage, as the man also believed who took up the land under the pre-emption act. These men indicted are the ones who bought of the men who cut the timber under the pre-emption, and by a decision of the Department they had no right to cut the timber, so that thus without any intention on their part they find themselves by a construction of law, probably correct, entrapped and indicted. A large number of citizens of the State have united with them in these prayers. The petition presented in the other House was signed by the governor of the State and a large number of the State officers, the registers and receivers of the land office, &c., agreeing with this petition, and by many of our best and most careful citizens of the State. The petition which I hold in my hand contains this private indorsement in writing from a large number of citizens, some of whom are personally known to me as men of high character, as follows:

The undersigned, citizens of California, doing business in said State, and deeply interested in matters relating to its prosperity and the welfare of its people, and being intimately acquainted with the persons who have already been indicted, and whom we know to be loyal and good citizens, respectfully urge that such measures should be immediately adopted in accordance with the prayer of this petition as will secure the Government and at the same time protect the accused and our citizens from present and further prosecutions and litigations, criminal or civil.

I would even venture longer upon the patience of the Senate, which has been so kind in this instance to give me so much time, provided I could add anything to the eloquence of the petitioners and the facts which they present. I move that this petition be referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and I really hope that the committee will give us an early report.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SARGENT. I present the petition of a large number of citizens of Pennsylvania, praying Congress to take steps to amend the Federal Constitution by adding the following article:

SECTION 1. The right of citizens of the United States to vote shall not be denied or abridged by the United States or by any State on account of sex.

SEC. 2. The Congress shall have power to enforce this article by appropriate legislation.

I move the reference of this petition to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

The motion was agreed to.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a letter from the Secretary of War, recommending the repeal of section 1233 of the Revised Statutes; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. COCKRELL, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 281) for the relief of Captain Gaines Lawson, of the United States Army, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. PLUMB, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 644) for the relief of Dwight W. Hakes, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon, which was ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 713) for the relief of Martin Clark, reported it with an amendment, and submitted a report thereon, which was ordered to be printed.

He also, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 859) for the relief of Charles L. Davenport, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon, which was ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 801) to amend section 2403 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, in relation to deposits for surveys, reported it with an amendment, and submitted a report thereon, which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. BURNSIDE, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 741) for the relief of Christopher H. McNally, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 260) for the relief of H. A. Myers, reported it with an amendment, and submitted a report thereon, which was ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 334) for the relief of William Bowlin, late of Company L, Second Arkansas Cavalry, reported it with an amendment, and submitted a report thereon, which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. BRUCE, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 454) granting a pension to Stephen C. Herndon, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. HAMLIN. The Committee on Foreign Relations, to whom were referred a memorial of merchants and others in the Chamber of Commerce in the city of New York; a memorial of the Boylston Insurance Company and others, merchants of Boston; and a memorial of Philip & Thomas Collins, merchants of Pennsylvania and others, and memorials of various other parties; and also a communication from the Secretary of State, recommending the re-establishment of our diplomatic relations with the State of Colombia, have directed me to report the same, and ask to be discharged from their consideration. The committee, however, are favorable to the restoration of diplomatic relations with that government, and had prepared an amendment to be offered to the diplomatic bill, but the Committee on Appropriations wisely, as the Committee on Foreign Relations believe, have anticipated our action and have prepared such an amendment to the bill. On behalf of the Committee on Foreign Relations, therefore, I move that they be discharged from the further consideration of these memorials.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. WALLACE, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 923) supplementary to the act entitled "An act to carry into effect the convention between the United States and China, concluded on the 8th day of November, 1858, at Shanghai," approved March 3, 1859, and to give the Court of Claims jurisdiction in certain cases, reported it with amendments, and submitted a report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

He also, from the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 55) for the relief of John W. Douglass, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. MAXEY, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 604) for the relief of John Bowles, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 161) for the relief of Charles W. Biese, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. CHRISTIANCY. I am instructed by the majority of the Committee on the Judiciary to report back the bill (S. No. 35) to repeal the bankrupt law, and I wish to say in behalf of some members of the committee who have united in the report that an honest effort has been made for some time past to see if some amendments could not be adopted which would render the act satisfactory to the public; but in that effort it has been found that the opinions are so opposed to each other that it has been impracticable to agree upon any system of amendments; and yet some members who unite in the report do not wish to have the report made with any recommendation. For one member of the committee, I will say that I have all along been in favor of the entire repeal, saving all rights in actions pending; but as other members of the committee do not now wish to commit themselves by a recommendation, I move that the bill be placed on the Calendar.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be placed on the Calendar.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. OGLESBY. By the request of a citizen of the District of Columbia, I ask leave to introduce a bill.

By unanimous consent, leave was granted to introduce a bill (S. No. 991) to legalize a suit now pending in the supreme court of the District of Columbia between the eastern and western Cherokee Indians, and for other purposes; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. MORGAN asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 992) for the relief of Columbus F. Perry and Elizabeth H. Gilmer, of Chambers County, Alabama; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 993) for the relief of Murphy Jones, Lizzie Massie, and Fanny Thames; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. JOHNSTON (by request) asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 994) for the relief of Albert Ordway; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

Mr. BAILEY asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 995) for the relief of T. A. Kendig; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

Mr. INGALLS asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 996) granting a pension to Edmund Woog; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

ACCOUNTS OF INTERNAL-REVENUE COLLECTORS.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia, submitted the following resolution; which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed:

Whereas on the 18th day of February, 1871, the Secretary of the Treasury, in obedience to a resolution of the House of Representatives, adopted December 13,

1870, made a statement (Executive Document 140, third session, Forty-first Congress) showing balances due from collectors of internal revenue who were out of office on the 30th day of June, 1870, from which it appears there was due on that day from collectors not in office the sum of $20,700,983.33: Therefore,

Be it resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, directed to report to the Senate what amount or portion of this sum has been since collected and paid into the Treasury; what amount, if any, has been settled by compromise, and the facts touching such compromise made, by whom recommended, and the amount realized; what amount or portion of said sum of $20,700,983.33 remains unpaid, and if any balance is still due, what steps have been taken to enforce payment of the same. Also to report the amounts due by internal-revenue collectors on the 1st day of July, 1875, and how much, if any, of such amounts remain unpaid.

THE M'GARRAHAN CLAIM.

On motion of Mr. OGLESBY, it was Ordered, That there be printed for the use of the Senate the testimony taken before the Committee on Public Lands, having under consideration the memorial of William McGarrahan for relief.

SENATOR FROM SOUTH CAROLINA.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. Some time ago I presented the petition of Mr. D. T. Corbin, of South Carolina, touching the matter of his claim to a seat in this body. The petition at my request was laid on the table. I now move that the petition be taken from the table and referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

The motion was agreed to.

THE FISHERIES COMMISSION.

Mr. BLAINE. I move, Mr. President, that the correspondence between the American and British Governments in regard to the appointment of Mr. Delfosse on the Halifax commission be taken from the table and referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs. I beg at the same time to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that the correspondence more than justifies all I said in regard to the very extraordinary efforts of Lord Granville to force Mr. Delfosse upon our Government. I would particularly direct attention to the letter of Sir Edward Thornton, of August 19, 1873, and to Mr. Fish's reply on the 21st of the same month.

When the resolution calling for this correspondence was before the Senate, I agreed with my honorable colleague, the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, that the award would be paid, not because it was just or was founded upon any fact or evidence submitted to the Halifax commission, but simply because it was an award which for honor's sake we might pay though we got nothing for the large sum required. And if the payment of five and a half millions were the end of the matter I should be willing to vote it in silence and bury the whole matter out of sight. But the truth is that this award is only the beginning of trouble. The period for which it pays will be ended in five years and then our privilege for inshore fishing must be negotiated afresh. It was well known at Halifax during the session of the commission that the Canadian authorities were striving not simply for the large sum in hand but for the fixing of a rate by which to assess the price of the inshore fisheries in future. It is our duty to show that the rate fixed by the Halifax commission has no foundation whatever in truth or in fact and that no evidence was before the commission to justify the award. I hold in my hand some statistics of very great interest bearing on the question, from which it appears that the total value of the catch in the inshore fisheries by American fishermen during the four years the treaty has been in operation was only $435,170, on which the profit was probably $100,000. This covers the entire catch for which we obtained the right under the treaty. During the same four years the duties on Canadian fish and oil remitted by our Government amounted to a million and a half of dollars in gold, and now under this treaty we are compelled to pay half a million per annum in addition or two millions of dollars in gold coin for the four years. In other words, by remission of duties and the payment of cash from the Treasury our Government is called upon to pay three and a half millions of dollars in gold coin for the privilege of permitting our fishermen to make a profit of $100,000 on the inshore fisheries of Nova Scotia.

Considerable comment has been made in the country on the point suggested by me that the Washington treaty required the unanimous verdict of the Halifax commissioners before a legally valid award could be made. I quoted some eminent English authorities in support of this position. Since then a friend has shown me a copy of the London Times of July 6, 1877, containing an elaborate editorial article in regard to the fishery commission then about to assemble in Halifax. In discussing the powers of the commission, the Times said:

On every point that comes before the fishery commission for decision the unanimous consent of all its members is, by the terms of the treaty, necessary before an authoritative verdict can be given.

And the Times then points out the difference between the Geneva tribunal and the Halifax commission, showing that a majority could decide at Geneva but affirming that the United States would have a perfect right to demand unanimity in the verdict at Halifax.

It is also well known that the Halifax commission was discussed by the Canadian ministry in 1875, after the negotiations for a reciprocity treaty had failed. On that occasion Mr. Blake, the minister of justice, remarked that the "amount of compensation we shall receive must be an amount unanimously agreed upon by the commissioners." I mention these facts to show that I spoke with full authority when I suggested that the verdict rendered at Halifax was not legally binding under the terms of the treaty. Its payment must be justified on other grounds, and I have already intimated more than once that considerations entirely outside of the legality or the justice of the award might constrain us to assent to its payment. But it should never be paid without such protest as will forever prevent its being quoted as a precedent or accepted as a standard to measure the value of the inshore fisheries in future negotiations.

The motion was agreed to.

ARMS TO THE MILITIA.

Mr. COKE. I ask that the bill (S. No. 104) amending section 1661, title 16, (The Militia,) of the Revised Statutes of the United States be made the special order for Monday next after the morning hour. The bill was reported from the Committee on Military Affairs by my colleague, [Mr. MAXEY.]

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Texas?

Mr. MORRILL. The reading of the title of the bill does not indicate what the subject is at all.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be reported at length, or so much of it as may be necessary to give the information desired.

The bill was read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Texas? The Chair hears none, and the order will be entered.

Mr. COKE. I ask permission to offer an amendment to the bill as it has been reported by the committee; and I move that the amendment be printed.

The amendment was received and ordered to be printed.

TAX ON DISTILLED SPIRITS.

Mr. BAYARD. I am instructed by the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the joint resolution (H. R. No. 133) to prescribe the time for the payment of the tax on distilled spirits, and for other purposes, to report it back without amendment. I ask for its present consideration.

Mr. HARRIS. I inquire if the bill (S. No. 855) for the relief of Warren Mitchell, which was under consideration at the expiration of the morning hour yesterday, does not come up as the unfinished business?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. There is no unfinished business in the morning hour. The only unfinished business is that which was pending at the adjournment of the Senate. The Secretary will report at length the joint resolution reported by the Senator from Delaware.

The joint resolution was read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of this resolution? The Chair hears none and it is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole.

The joint resolution provides that the tax on all distilled spirits hereafter entered for deposit in distillery warehouses shall be due and payable before and at the time the same are withdrawn therefrom, and within three years from the date of the entry for deposit therein; and warehousing bonds hereafter taken under the provisions of section 3293 of the Revised Statutes of the United States shall be conditioned for the payment of the tax on the spirits as specified in the entry, and the interest on the tax, if any has accrued under the provisions of this resolution, before removal from the distillery warehouse, and within three years from the date of the bonds.

The time within which distilled spirits heretofore entered for deposit in distillery warehouses are required to be withdrawn therefrom pursuant to the conditions of any warehousing bond, taken within one year prior to the passage of this resolution, upon the entry of such spirits into warehouse under the provisions of section 3293 of the Revised Statutes, shall, on written request being made, be extended for a period not exceeding three years from the date of the entry of such spirits into the warehouse; but such extension shall not be made in any case unless there shall be indorsed upon, or appended to, the warehousing bond a written request therefor, and an acknowledgment of their liability, under the terms of the bond, for the period for which the extension is granted, together with interest on the tax, if any has accrued under the provisions of the resolution, as if the same were inserted in the body of the bond, to be duly executed by the principal and sureties in the bond, and acknowledged by each of them before a collector or deputy collector of internal revenue, or some other officer authorized by law to take the acknowledgment of deeds; and the sureties on the bond are to be, at the time of such request, satisfactory to the collector, and, if not satisfactory, or if the sureties shall refuse to make the request and acknowledgment required an additional or new warehousing bond, with sureties satisfactory to the collector, shall be given.

In case of the non-payment of the tax on any distilled spirits within one year from the date of the original warehousing bond for such spirits, interest shall accrue upon the tax at the rate of 5 per cent. per annum from and after the expiration of the year until the tax shall be paid.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment.

Mr. CONKLING. Is this resolution reported by the Committee on Finance?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair so understands. It has been so stated by the Senator from Delaware.

Mr. BAYARD. Yes, sir.

The joint resolution was ordered to a third reading, and read the third time.

Mr. MORRILL. Mr. President, this resolution received the consideration of the Committee on Finance and it is reported favorably. At the same time I feel it my duty to say that I am somewhat doubtful whether the resolution will do more good than harm. It will delay the receipt of taxes to a considerable amount in the Treasury Department. At the same time there seems to be a very pressing demand for its immediate passage. There are, as it was stated by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, some five or six million gallons of spirits that are now in bond that are likely to be seized for non-payment of duties by the United States and sold at an immense sacrifice. Under the circumstances I do not desire to interpose against the passage of the measure, while I am extremely doubtful whether it will prove beneficial or not.

The joint resolution was passed.

FORT FETTERMAN MILITARY RESERVATION.

Mr. PLUMB. I move to proceed to the consideration of Senate bill No. 901.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (S. No. 901) to authorize the Secretary of War to relinquish certain portions of the United States military reservation of Fort Fetterman, Wyoming Territory, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It authorizes the Secretary of War to relinquish and transfer to the custody and control of the Secretary of the Interior, for disposition under the existing laws of the United States relating to the public lands, such portions of the reservation at Fort Fetterman, in the Territory of Wyoming, as may no longer be required for military purposes, together with the whole of the old "wood and timber" reservation near that post, declared by executive order dated August 29, 1872.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

JOSIAH H. PILLSBURY.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. I move to take up for present consideration Senate bill No. 659.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (S. No. 659) for the relief of Josiah H. Pillsbury was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides for the payment to Josiah H. Pillsbury, postmaster at Manhattan, Kansas, of $476.96, of which he was robbed on the night of the 28th of June, 1877, and which he has accounted for to the Government, the robbery having occurred without neglect or other fault on his part.

The Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads reported the bill with an amendment in line 5, after the words "sum of," to strike out "$476.96 being the amount of post-office funds," and insert "$323.95."

Mr. KERNAN. Is there a written report?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. There is.

Mr. KERNAN. Let it be read.

The Chief Clerk read the following report, submitted by Mr. KIRKWOOD on the 4th instant:

The Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, to which was referred the bill (S. No. 659) for the relief of Josiah H. Pillsbury, have considered the same, and report:

That said Pillsbury, on the 28th day of June, 1877, was, and yet is, postmaster at Manhattan, Riley County, Kansas; that on the night of that day the post-office at Manhattan was entered by burglars, the safe therein, in which were kept the moneys and stamps of the Post-Office Department, and registered letters, was broken open and robbed of money-order funds, postal funds, and registered letters, containing money to the amount of about $476.96, which amount the postmaster has since made good to the Department.

The special agent sent by the Post-Office Department to investigate the matter reports, among other things, as follows:

"The post-office is kept in a frame building in the principal business street, and was entered by the robbers through a side window near the back part of the room in which the office is kept. The safe used by the postmaster is one of Hall's patent combination four-tumbler locks, and weighs about seven hundred pounds, and was entered by means of a sledge-hammer weighing ten and three-quarter pounds.

Mr. Pillsbury, the postmaster, is considered by the citizens of Manhattan as a very worthy and careful postmaster, and I am satisfied that he took the same care of the Government property that he did of his own."

It also appears that the safe broken open and robbed was furnished by the postmaster at his own expense, and was such a one as the Government furnishes to second-class officers.

Mr. Pillsbury, immediately after the robbery, gave notice thereof to the proper officer of the Department, and promptly paid over the amount of money stolen.

The post-office at Manhattan is of the third class; the population of the town is about twelve hundred; and it contains two private banks, but no national bank.

In his report the special agent says:

"While Mr. Pillsbury took every precaution, under the circumstances, to secure the door and window of said post-office, yet I am of the opinion it was very unsafe to risk $500 in money and valuable letters, not knowing the value of contents, in a safe which was not burglar-proof, in a frame building which was not occupied by any one at night. Mr. Pillsbury being the custodian of public money and Government property, and being paid for the care of said money and property, did not show any desire to shirk the responsibility resting upon him, but paid the losses reported herein."

The same report shows that of the amount stolen $288.40 was money-order funds, $155 postal funds in money, and $35.55 contents of registered letters.

Your committee are of the opinion that, upon these facts, the postmaster should be reimbursed the amount of money-order funds and the amount contained in registered letters, and that he should not be reimbursed the amount of postal funds. They therefore propose to amend the bill by striking out, in lines 5, 6, and 7, the words "four hundred and seventy-six dollars and ninety-six cents, being the amount of post-office funds," and inserting in lieu thereof the words "three hundred and twenty-three dollars and ninety-five cents;" and recommend that the bill, so amended, be passed.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVALS.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. O. L. PRUDEN, one of his Secretaries, announced that the President had on the 25th instant approved and signed the joint resolution (S. R. No. 21) filling an existing vacancy in the Board of Regents of the Smithsonian Institution.

The message also announced that the President had this day approved and signed the act (S. No. 611) to extend the charter of the Franklin Insurance Company of the City of Washington.

THE PACIFIC RAILROADS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The morning hour has expired, and the Senate now proceeds to the consideration of its unfinished business, being the bill (S. No. 15) to alter and amend the act entitled "An act to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from the Missouri River to the Pacific Ocean, and to secure to the Government the use of the same for postal, military, and other purposes," approved July 1, 1862, and also to alter and amend the act of Congress approved July 2, 1864, in amendment of said first-named act, on which the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. MERRIMON] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. MERRIMON. Mr. President, I am without motive and I am not conscious of any desire to deprive the railroad companies mentioned in the pending bill of any measure of justice to which they may be fairly entitled, or to impose upon them any unreasonable burdens. I am willing that they shall have all which of right belongs to them. In my efforts to learn what their rights are in their relations to the Government, I wish to pay due regard to the rights and interests of the latter, and I will not allow my judgment and my action to be controlled by empty declamation, false notions of public generosity, and a misapprehension of facts and law. Nor will I consent to be driven into the support of one measure and from the support of another, by oft-repeated threats, whether made in or out of this Chamber, of long-protracted and expensive litigation. My fixed purpose is, to seek and find the pathway of truth, justice, and sound policy and to walk steadily in it, trusting confidently that fruitful and wholesome results will follow.

The corporations named, now as in the past, assert with defiant confidence and insolent self-sufficiency what they and their friends are pleased to call their rights and advantages as against the Government. It is pertinent and worth while to inquire with some particularity into the merits of the claims and pretensions of these corporations and the conduct and practices of those who control them and see whether or not these are really meritorious and well founded; or whether, on the contrary, the controlling corporations have been and are for the most part utterly without merit; have grossly and persistently perverted and prostituted their corporate powers and perpetrated stupendous frauds upon the Government, and thereby unjustly and greatly enriched themselves and others at the expense of the people of the Union. In my judgment, it is not only pertinent, but likewise very important to make these inquiries and learn the spirit and practices of these corporations from the beginning of their existence down to the present time, in order that we may learn and appreciate the absolute necessity for the adoption of the measure proposed by the Committee on the Judiciary, or one more stringent, if upon due inquiry the Constitution and the state of the law will allow of it. In view of the vast interests of the Government and the people, peculiarly and otherwise, involved in the subject before the Senate, I must be pardoned for expressing my surprise that the committee in their report have failed to call attention specially to the practices of these corporations. I undertake to say and shall briefly endeavor to show, that these have been monstrous, without a parallel in this or any country, and shocking to the moral sense of the American people.

Mr. President, I do not question the usefulness, the public benefits derived from and the general importance of corporations. They serve great purposes in the economy of society, and have contributed largely, within the last century, to the advancement of civilization and the promotion of the prosperity and happiness of mankind. They are the chief means for organizing and making efficient co-operative effort in the employment of capital and labor. Through them capital is aggregated, organized, consolidated, and brought within the control of small numbers of intelligent and powerful, unhappily, sometimes, very corrupt men, and thus it is made effective for great good, too often for evil. But if they have vast capabilities for the advancement of the prosperity of great communities, they likewise afford opportunity to do, and often do them, great harm. Their history shows that, uniformly, when they are unregulated, unrestrained, and uncontrolled by the strong arm of Government they corrupt public men, foster and establish burdensome monopolies, and often become tremendous engines of illicit power and wide-spread oppression. Through such instrumentalities, the cupidity and avarice of designing men achieve their most signal triumphs.

In this country corporations have multiplied wonderfully within the last fifty years. They may be numbered by the thousand, and they embrace nearly every branch of industry and business, and embody the great mass of capital. Well authenticated statistics show that there are now in the United States more than two thousand national banks, all corporations embodying and controlling nearly $2,000,000,000, more than forty-five hundred banks, most of them corporations other than national banks, aggregating $225,000,000 of capital stock, and deposits amounting to more than $1,350,000,000; that there are more than fifteen hundred railroad corporations embodying and controlling $5,000,000,000. There are several thousand other manufacturing and business corporations that control several hundreds of millions of dollars. That a large percentage of this vast number of corporations, embracing some of the largest and most influential, have not been wisely and sufficiently guarded and restrained by law; that they have in many instances prostituted their corporate powers for their own illicit gain, and to the grievous detriment of the Government, State and Federal, and the people generally; that they have unduly and arbitrarily combined and confederated to direct and control industries, trade, travel, and commerce; that they have virtually destroyed the trade of one town or locality in order to build up another to serve selfish purposes of gain; that they have in some instances combined to exact oppressive freights and fares from the producing classes of the country, and in others, in the absence of competition, have exacted them; that they have debauched and unlawfully controlled legislative bodies and hundreds of public men in and out of official stations; that these evils have been flagrant and prevailed to an alarming extent, that they now prevail to a greater or less degree, no intelligent observer can deny: their existence has been made manifest by legislative and judicial investigations, and the newspapers of the country daily teem with accounts of them.

The facts are patent. These vicious practices have not only affected injuriously the substantial interests of the Government and the people, they have likewise given rise to disgraceful public scandals that have brought open reproach upon the good name of this country at home and abroad. These things have not been done in a corner: they have prevailed in all sections and have afflicted the people in every quarter of the Union. It seems to be taken for granted that corporations are not only soulless but, as well, that they have no moral responsibility, and that no person is or can be morally responsible for the character of their acts. This latter view is certainly false and pernicious, but it shows the greater necessity for careful and stringent legislative control of such artificial bodies.

Mr. President, I do not hesitate to declare my conviction, that one of the great rising public dangers in this country now is the undue, ever-increasing power and influence of corporations over the material, moral, and social interests of the people.

This subject ought to attract a large share of public attention and engage the serious consideration of every legislative body. I do not underrate the advantages and benefits, public and private, of railroad corporations. I recognize them. I am not hostile to them. I would not, I will not hesitate to protect them in all their just rights, but I see and know and appreciate the high importance of keeping them well guarded by proper legislation and in subordination to government. They have great capacities for evil as well as good. They are close to the people and affect them materially in almost all the relations of life. Much the greater part of the evils to which I have made reference have been the fruits of the vicious practices of railroad corporations and their agents. Every intelligent observer knows that they have in large measure dominated the industries, the trade, the travel, the commerce, the legislation, the public men, and the press of this country. Not infrequently they have debauched members of Congress and members of State Legislatures, they have repeatedly subsidized numbers of powerful newspapers, they have set up and pulled down public men, they have walked boldly and insolently into the Halls of Congress and undertaken to dictate measures of legislation. Nay, sir, if one may trust what he reads almost daily in the newspapers and hears on every hand, their agents and lobbyists through the corridors and lobbies, and have for months, of this Capitol, in reference to the very measures now under consideration.

Sir, are these things true? Are they substantially true? Alas, they are too true! The mind sickens with disgust at the thought of them! The recital of them must fill every honest man with indignation.

Mr. President, there could scarcely be a more striking illustration of the truth and force of all I have said than the history and practices of the two corporations involved in this discussion. I propose to make some reference to them in the course of my further remarks, for the purpose, specially, of showing the necessity for passing the measure before the Senate, and, generally, the importance of guarding here and elsewhere against the evils to which I have in a very general way directed attention.

Mr. President, the corporations whose nature, rights, and obligations are under discussion are not ordinary ones, nor do they in the eye of the law stand exactly on the same footing as do ordinary ones. They have been created by virtue and in pursuance of acts of Congress. Congress has no power to create corporations for ordinary purposes. It has, indeed, been questioned whether it has power to create them at all; but the courts have decided otherwise, and I think correctly. But it can only create them in aid of the execution of some power in or purpose incident to and necessarily connected with the Government. They can be created only for national purposes, purposes of the Government. The Government of the United States was instituted for certain general purposes common to all the States composing the Union, and these purposes and the powers in aid of them are plainly expressed in a written Constitution. We look in vain for any provision or power express or implied, authorizing Congress or any other authority in the Government to create a corporation in the ordinary sense or for ordinary purposes. The existence of such a power is unnecessary. In reason, it contravenes the genius, the spirit, the nature of our Federal system. All corporations created by Congress are therefore, without any express statutory provision, very like public corporations.

I will not now say—it is not necessary for my present purpose that I do so—that such corporations are absolutely public corporations and subject at all times to be abolished, changed, and modified by Congress, but in many respects they are so subject to the will of Congress. This much, however, is true beyond question, that Congress cannot divest itself of the power at all times to control and direct such corporations in all reasonable ways in aid of the purposes for which they were created; this power exists, and that too without any reservation of power in the act of incorporation; the power is absolutely and forever in Congress; it cannot part with it; Congress cannot abdicate a power of government. And whoever becomes a corporation in such a corporation does so agreeing by necessary legal implication that Congress may always exercise such power; that is, the power to change, modify, or abolish the corporation, having due, reasonable regard for the personal rights of the corporation. And so in the cases now before us, without any reservation of power in the acts creating and authorizing the corporations, Congress might change, add to, amend, modify, abolish the corporations in aid of the execution of the powers, the essential powers of government, which Congress cannot impair or barter or bargain away. If this were not so, Congress might impair, render nugatory, practically destroy an essential power of government by bargain—contract. This cannot be, in the very nature of things. The powers of this Government are essential powers to be employed in the execution of government, as contradistinguished from those powers of government employed in regulating the ordinary business transactions, rights, and relations of society.

The acts of Congress creating the corporations named in the bill rest upon and recognize the principles of the Constitution to which I have adverted.

Mr. SARGENT. Which corporation does the Senator refer to, those named in the bill?

Mr. MERRIMON. The Union Pacific Railroad Company and the Central Pacific Railroad Company.

Mr. SARGENT. Is not the Senator aware that the latter was not created by Congress?

Mr. MERRIMON. I am aware that originally the company was a corporation created under the laws of California.

Mr. SARGENT. It is, and operates under the laws of the State of California.

Mr. MERRIMON. But I take it the State of California has assented to the legislation of Congress, and at all events the acts of Congress, so far as they affect that corporation, are under the control of Congress. And besides, that corporation, I apprehend, derives much of its powers in the State of California and in the State of Nevada from the force and life-giving power of the two acts of Congress under discussion.

Mr. SARGENT. I only wanted to draw the Senator's attention to the fact that he apparently was confounding a corporation created under the laws of a State, having all its functions from that State, with another created under the laws of the United States.

Mr. MERRIMON. I was perfectly advertent to the fact, and I have considered it. If the State of California authorized the creation of a corporation and Congress co-operated with the State of California to create that corporation for the purposes of the Federal Government, and the State of California and the corporation accepted the legislation of Congress and agreed to act under it, then they are under the control of Congress, certainly to the extent of the legislation in that behalf.

Mr. SARGENT. I do not wish to disturb the Senator, but I hope he will allow me to make a remark.

Mr. MERRIMON. Certainly.

Mr. SARGENT. The corporation was born in the State of California, derives all its powers as a corporation, all its franchises from the State of California. It contracted with the Government of the United States under certain legislation passed by the Congress of the United States, and to that contract the State of California by subsequent legislation assented; but it is not true that the Central Pacific Railroad Company derives any of its corporate functions from the Congress of the United States; and if it does, I ask the Senator to refer to the clause of any statute of the United States which gives any additional corporate function to the Central Pacific.

Mr. SAULSBURY. The road was authorized by Congress to go through the Territory of Nevada.

Mr. SARGENT. It unquestionably owns a railroad which runs from San Francisco through to Ogden, and a large portion of it was built under this contract, projecting it into the Territories. Of course it was built under this contract, which was according to the laws of Congress.

Mr. BAILEY. I ask if the Central Pacific Railroad Company exercised any of its faculties or could have made any progress whatever in respect to that portion of its road which lay without the State of California without the consent of the Congress of the United States; or in other words, whether in respect to that portion of its road lying east of the eastern boundary of the State of California it does not derive all its authority and all its franchises from the act of Congress?

Mr. SARGENT. No, sir; it does not derive any authority or any franchise from Congress, except the mere authority to build a railroad in the Territories, which was done, as I say, under a contract, they agreeing to do it within a certain time and in a certain manner, that it should be open to Government uses for certain purposes, and the Government contracted therefor to issue so many bonds. That was all. It was a matter of contract; but it was not a part of the functions of the corporation in any sense; it then was a complete corporation in every sense. It might as well be said that a company owning a line of steamers and receiving a subsidy to run from New York or somewhere else to Brazil derives its corporate powers from the fact of a subsidy being given by Congress. It is simply a contract.

Mr. BAILEY. The capacity to exist as a corporation unquestionably was derived from the State of California. The capacity to construct this road through the Territory or the present State of Nevada and into Utah certainly could not have been derived from the State of California.

Mr. SARGENT. I am not denying that there was a contract.

Mr. BAILEY. That franchise, that right, that power to extend its road and to collect tolls and transact business, could not be conferred there by the State of California; and this being a foreign corporation to the United States as to the Territories, I ask the Senator from California if the corporation did not derive its powers there from the United States.

Mr. SARGENT. The Senator simply uses the word "franchise" in a different sense from myself. I admit that a contract was made between this corporation and the Government of the United States, by which a railroad was built in the Territories under certain conditions. But the Senator from North Carolina in his argument spoke of these two corporations as creatures of Congress, and said that Congress could not divest itself of the right to strangle these, its children, at their birth or any subsequent time. I called his attention to the fact that one of them derived its powers from the State of California and that there was no right on the part of the General Government to strangle it.

Mr. MERRIMON. Mr. President, I was perfectly advertent to the fact that the Central Pacific Railroad Company was originally a corporation created by and under the laws of California; it was a State corporation, and by its corporate powers as a State corporation it had no authority to build a road across Nevada, then a Territory, or any part of the territory of the United States anywhere. The legislation of Congress supplemented the legislation of the State of California, and by virtue of the act of 1862 and the act of 1864 that corporation constructed its road in the State of California, as well as by virtue of the legislation of California, through the State of Nevada and other portions of the territory of the United States. It received large corporate powers—I know what that word means—it received large additions to its corporate powers from these two acts of Congress; it exercised them; it received large grants of public land; it received a large subsidy, as I shall have occasion to show, from the United States; and although Congress may not have power to abolish that corporation, yet there can be no question in law that Congress has control of its own legislation so far as it affects this corporation created by the State of California.

Mr. SARGENT. It has a right to take back all its gifts or executed contracts! That is the Senator's logic. Congress has power to break a contract!

Mr. MERRIMON. The grants conferred upon the Central Pacific Railroad were contained in the same acts which granted corporate powers to the Union Pacific road and a half dozen other railroad companies, exactly alike. The two acts authorized the existence of the Union Pacific Railroad Company; they likewise authorized the enlarged existence of the Central Pacific Railroad Company and a half dozen other corporations, and by the same law which conferred powers and benefits upon the Union Pacific Railroad Company and other railroad companies, benefits were conferred upon the Central Pacific Railroad Company.

Mr. SARGENT. Allow me to say a word. The legislation that the Senator refers to being put together would not change the relations of the various corporations. That legislation decided this—I think I remember it for I wrote it myself—that the Central Pacific Railroad Company of California, a corporation existing under the laws of said State, is hereby authorized to build a road—that was all—and then it went on and stated that which the Government would give it if it would build the road and that which it would require if the corporation did build the road. Now, says the Senator, because another corporation or several others were created in the same act, therefore the Government of the United States has a right to come in years after it is executed, years after the corporation has done everything that was required by the legislation except one point which is now in dispute in the courts, and say "why, here we subsidized you and we will take back our subsidy; we provided that you should pay in a certain way; we require you to pay three times as fast; we made certain conditions with you; we take them all back, and vary them, because we are powerful, because we are a sovereign and you are a subject." That is the doctrine of the Senator, and I say as between any ruler and any subject, that is the expression of tyranny.

Now the Senator will excuse me for saying further that my interest in this matter arises from the danger of an overtax of the Western States and the Pacific States by the burdens which you are endeavoring to put upon them, and furthermore the danger that by overcharging them you may have a dilapidated railroad instead of one to carry out the original objects.

Mr. MERRIMON. Mr. President, the Senator assigns me a position which I do not occupy, and he makes an argument and attributes it to me that I have not made in substance or spirit. Taking it that the Central Pacific Railroad Company is a corporation under the laws of California and that it accepted certain benefits and rights and obligations under the legislation of Congress, if the doctrine which I am now contending for exists, there can be no question that Congress has power to control whatever right, or obligation, or benefit it did confer, and to so control it would be no impairment of a contract, would be no exercise of a power of tyranny; and why? For the very reason that by force of the Constitution of the United States, if the doctrine I am contending for is correct, it was incorporated into the contract at the time it was made, in the same measure as if the words had been written in the grant, that Congress shall have the power at all times to change, modify, repeal, or abolish the legislation whereby these rights, obligations, and benefits were conferred. But, sir, in this case—and I will refer to that view of it now—not only by force of the Constitution is it so, but by the very terms of the grant it was provided, as I shall have occasion to show in the course of my argument, that Congress should have the right to change, modify, add to, or abolish the contract afterward, if, in its judgment, it should see fit. How, then, could there be any impairment of a contract or the obligation of a contract?

Mr. SARGENT. Now, if I am not troubling the Senator too much, if the Senator's argument had gone to the extent he now states and no further, as did that of the Senator from Michigan, [Mr. CHRISTIANCY,] I should not have interrupted him by asking a question. Of course I have my own judgment as to the force of that argument. But when he went outside and claimed jurisdiction over a corporation created by the State of California, upon the ground that it was created by our legislation, I desired to call his attention to the facts.

Mr. MERRIMON. I do not care to go into the question as to how far Congress has control of the corporation absolutely. It is not material to my purpose. It is only material to me to show here that Congress has control of that corporation so far as powers, rights, obligations, and duties were conferred and imposed upon it by the legislation of Congress, and I understand that the Senator does not deny that as to that extent, pro tanto, that Congress has the power.

Mr. SARGENT. That is in violation of the contract.

Mr. MERRIMON. It is no violation of the contract. I cannot make myself understood by the Senator, it seems. I say it is not so, because it was a part of the agreement at the time it was made—an agreement made as much as if the corporator had written it down in writing, that Congress should have this power. It entered into the contract, made a part of it, it was the very life of it, that Congress should control the exercise of the powers granted, and the corporations took them subject to this right of Congress.

Mr. SARGENT. Does the Senator refer to the provision in the acts of 1862 and 1864 as to the power to repeal, or does he refer to some unwritten law?

Mr. MERRIMON. I am now on the first branch of the subject. I am making an argument to show that this power is inherent in Congress and that Congress cannot divest itself of it. I am coming to the other view of the case afterward.

Mr. SARGENT. I simply say I do not agree with the Senator at all.

Mr. MERRIMON. The Senator has only anticipated me a little. I say that, if there was no reservation in these acts at all, corporations created by Congress, if they are not absolutely so, are very like public corporations, always subject to the control and power of Congress. If it were not so, Congress might in creating a corporation abdicate the powers of government and destroy the Government. It is one of those essential powers which, whenever the contract is made operates, and if Congress were to stipulate expressly in the act that a subsequent Congress should not exercise this power the stipulation would be absolutely void. It is one of the absolute powers, absolute rights of the Government, that cannot be destroyed; it exists while the Government exists, and it is always ready to be exercised; and the citizen, when he becomes a corporator under a corporation created by Congress, becomes a corporator with the stipulation as expressly made as if it were written in words, "Congress shall from time to time see to the exercise of the power, modify, change, control it, as may suit the interests and convenience of the Government." I have no doubt that power does exist and in the way I have indicated.

Mr. HILL. Will the Senator yield to me for a moment that I may ask a question?

Mr. MERRIMON. I will.

Mr. HILL. If the power is claimed for the Government over the corporate franchise I can understand it. But do you hold that a contract of loan by the Government to the companies is either a franchise in the companies or a corporate privilege granted by the Government?

Mr. MERRIMON. I say that the Government can grant a franchise for the purposes of corporations. It can grant a subsidy.

Mr. HILL. That is not the question.

Mr. MERRIMON. I see the point the Senator is making and I think I shall come to it in a moment. I do not mean to say that by virtue of the rights conferred on a corporation by the Government the Government can arbitrarily take property from the corporation. I do not mean to say that, because that would violate the spirit of the Constitution; it would violate the express letter of the Constitution in one respect. But what I mean to say is, that Congress has the power to direct the corporation in the exercise of all its rights and all its property, and it may abolish the franchise and may abolish all the powers conferred in the interest of the Government, and therefore I put in the words a moment ago "with due, reasonable regard to the rights of the corporators." It was a part of the agreement that Congress should have the power to control, direct, and regulate the exercise of the rights and powers and property of the corporation. The corporator agreed to that when he became a corporator. And if that is not true, then Congress can abdicate a sacred power of government by creating a corporation, which is plainly impossible consistently with reason. Congress cannot by any act, I do not care what device may be adopted, divest itself of the power to raise an army or to construct a post-road or a military road; it cannot divest itself of a power of government. It may employ these powers and may employ agents to execute these powers, but whoever engages as an agent or a corporation to execute these powers, engages that Congress may control his property in that behalf in order to accomplish the great purpose of the Government. But, sir, this will be made more manifest in the course of my argument. The question of the Senator from California has anticipated much of what I was going to say.

Before we go further let us get a correct notion of the motive and purposes of the acts under discussion.

Congress passed an act approved July 1, 1862, entitled as follows, to wit: "An act to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from the Missouri River to the Pacific Ocean"—and what? The words I am about to read now are very material—"and to secure to the Government the use of the same for postal, military, and other purposes."

This title plainly indicates the purpose of Congress—a purpose of Government and in aid of the execution of a power, an essential power of the Government. It was to create a military and postal road. And not merely to authorize and construct such a road for the use of the Government, but to secure—that is the important word—the use of the same to the Government. The word secure is a material, significant, and important one; it means to give the Government the use of it; not at the will of the corporation, but at the will and pleasure of the Government, not for an occasion, for a day or a year, but perpetually; not affected by the whim or fortune of the corporation, but absolutely, and to secure, to establish, indefinitely, perpetually, such use of the road to the Government. How secure such use? Plainly by all such reasonable, apt, sufficient means as Congress may from time to time, according to circumstances, direct and provide. And this right and power and use is not in any way affected by the pecuniary rights of the Government, or the indebtedness of the corporations; when they shall pay all the debts due and to come due to the Government, the latter will still have the right, undiminished, to secure to itself the use of the road for all lawful Government purposes.

The wording, the phraseology, the reason, the spirit of the act and all acts amendatory of it, all alike indicate, establish the right of the Government to such use of the roads and the right to secure such use of them. It is provided that the Government shall have directors, who shall own no stock in the companies. The right of way and alternate sections of land are donated to the companies "for the construction of said railroad and telegraph line, * * * to secure the safe and speedy transportation of the mails, troops, munitions of war, and public stores thereon." When forty miles of the road shall be completed, "the President shall appoint three commissioners to examine the same and report to him in relation thereto," &c. Again, it is provided "that, for the purposes herein mentioned, the Secretary of the Treasury shall, upon the certificate in writing of said commissioners," &c., the commissioners appointed by the President, issue bonds of the Government to the companies. It is further provided that, "on refusal or failure of the said company to pay said bonds, or any part of them," &c., the road, property, and unsold lands, &c., "may be taken possession of by the Secretary of the Treasury for the use and benefit of the United States;" not to be sold and the Government to be reimbursed, but "for the use and benefit of the United States," the purpose being to secure the use of the road for the established and only for lawful purposes of the Government.

The grants of land, the "bond-subsidy," were all made on condition that the companies "shall keep said railroad and telegraph line in repair and use, and shall at all times transmit dispatches over said telegraph line, and transport mails, troops, and munitions of war, supplies, and public stores upon said railroad for the Government whenever required to do so by any department thereof," &c. The companies are required to make reports to the Secretary of the Interior. For the purposes of the Government, the lines of railroad are to be continuous. If the companies should fail to complete these roads respectively, or to keep the same in repair, Congress may legislate to this end, "and may direct the income of said railroad and telegraph line to be thereafter devoted to the use of the United States," &c.

Congress passed an act amendatory of the act just commented upon, approved July 2, 1864, the title of which reads as follows:

An act to amend an act entitled "An act to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from the Missouri River to the Pacific Ocean, and to secure to the Government the use of the same for postal, military, and other purposes," approved July 1, 1862.

The same purpose is indicated in this title as in the first one, and all the provisions of the act steadily point to the exercise of all such power by the Government as may be deemed by Congress necessary and wise to secure the perpetual use of the roads for Government purposes.

These are some of the reasons that lead me to conclude that Congress has the power, without any express reservation providing for the same, to change, modify, amend, and abolish the rights, duties, and powers of the corporations named, having due, reasonable regard for the rights of the corporators.

It is said this would impair the obligation of a contract; that it would change, make anew a contract without the consent of one of the contracting parties. I do not stop to discuss the question whether Congress has the power to expressly impair the obligation of a contract. If it has such a power, I would not invoke it, and I trust Congress will never do so. But the objection is not well founded. The exercise of the power I have been discussing does not impair the obligation of a contract or force the corporator to accept a new contract, because at the time he became a corporator, he agreed, by necessary legal implication in law, that Congress should have the power to change the rights, duties, and obligations of the corporations to the Government in respect to the purposes of the corporations, at will, having reasonable regard to the rights of the corporator, be so agreed, just in the same measure as if he had so expressly stipulated in the charter of incorporation. The spirit, the principle of the Constitution permeated the charter just as much as if the same had been expressed in terms in it and the corporator must be bound by it.

I cannot doubt the substantial correctness of the views I have expressed. But it is not necessary in the case before us to invoke the power of the Constitution, to which I have referred. Putting these corporations upon the footing of ordinary ones, Congress has power to impose the reasonable obligations on them proposed by the bill reported by the Committee on the Judiciary. Section 18 of the act of 1862 among other things provides as follows:

And the better to accomplish the object of this act, namely, to promote the public interest and welfare by the construction of said railroad and telegraph line, and keeping the same in working order, and to secure to the Government at all times (but particularly in time of war) the use and benefits of the same for postal, military, and other purposes, Congress may at any time—having due regard for the rights of said companies named herein—add to, alter, amend, or repeal this act.

Mr. MAXEY. I ask the Senator from North Carolina, supposing that Congress has the power to impair the obligation of a contract, now, is that the pivotal point of this case? Is it necessary to rest the Judiciary Committee's bill upon that ground?

Mr. MERRIMON. I have said expressly it is not. It is not material to the discussion of this question at all.

Mr. MAXEY. I wish to understand that.

Mr. MERRIMON. As I have just said, if Congress has power to impair the obligation of a contract, I, for one, would never invoke it and I trust Congress never will in any case.

Mr. MAXEY. I mention that for the reason that I propose to support the bill; but if it turned on that point I would not support it, because I do not believe that doctrine.

Mr. SARGENT. It would surprise me if it was not necessary to sustain the Judiciary bill by the declaration of a power to violate contracts and impair their obligations, so much time has been taken up by the friends of that bill in asserting that power. There certainly has been a great deal of time spent in that endeavor.

Mr. MERRIMON. I am not responsible in any sense for what other gentlemen have done; but I do not remember—and I have been paying pretty close attention to this discussion—that any one has wasted much time in discussing that view of the case. It is not material here at all. The bill proposed by the Committee on the Judiciary goes upon an entirely different ground, and rests upon an entirely different principle. But to get back, I was discussing the reservation clause in the act of 1862. Now the power reserved, treating the act as a contract between the United States and the corporators, is a material part of the contract—the corporators agree that the Congress may "add to, alter, amend, or repeal this act." These words—this provision—cannot be treated as nugatory and mere surplusage; they must be given some effect according to their intent and meaning.

What is that? It is that "Congress may add to, alter, amend, or repeal this act" * * * the better to accomplish the object of this act." What is the object of this act? The great purpose, the leading object of it is to construct and establish on solid and enduring foundations in every respect, a great government military and postal road, and the power reserved may be exercised in any reasonable way looking to that end. The clause reserving power, after stating the purpose in general terms, "the object of this act," then specifies some, not all, of the things that make up the object of this act. One of these things is, "to promote the public interest and welfare by the construction of said railroad and telegraph line and keeping the same in working order." It is said the companies have done this. But this implies more than keeping it in "working order" for this month or this year; it means keeping it so indefinitely, perpetually. Are the companies in condition to do this? Can they do it? Will they do it? Are their circumstances such as they will be able to do it? Can any one say so in view of their vast indebtedness? Even some of their officers have expressed great doubt as to their ability to pay their debts, as I will show presently. Then is it not plain that Congress may, ought to, exercise the power to "add to, alter, amend, or repeal this act," to compel these companies to provide prudently for the payment of these vast debts which constitute liens on their roads and all the property connected with them, to the end they may in all the future, be reasonably in condition to keep the roads in "working order"? Especially, when the companies have taken no steps to prepare to pay their debts?

Another of the things specified in the reservation of power to Congress and which goes to make up "the object of this act" is, "to secure to the Government at all times, (but particularly in time of war,) the use and benefits of the same for postal, military, and other purposes." The companies say they have done this. But do they say so truly? Granted that they have not made default. This is not all that is plainly implied and required. The companies must keep themselves in reasonable condition to secure to the Government for the future, indefinitely, the use of the roads and telegraph lines. The Government cannot reasonably allow these companies to let a burden of debt accumulate upon them which they cannot easily manage, so that after awhile the mortgages must be foreclosed and the roads embarrassed and allowed to go to ruin and decay in the hands of themselves by reason of their insolvency, or in the hands of irresponsible purchasers. We know it is not denied that the companies owe vast, embarrassing debts which they cannot pay at maturity unless they begin now to make reasonable preparations to do so. Then, it is plainly the duty of Congress to this end, for this manifest purpose, to exercise the power reserved to "add to, alter, amend, or repeal this act."

But there is another thing that goes to make up "the object of this act," that is, to provide for the payment to the Government of a sum of money equal to the principal and interest of the bonds of the Government issued to the companies, when they shall mature and be paid by the Government. It is expressly provided that such sum of money shall be paid to the Government and it has a second mortgage to secure such payment. The general terms, "the object of this act," embraces this by all rules of construction; and to secure the payment of that debt Congress may in a reasonable way "add to, alter, amend, or repeal this act."

The words in the clause reserving power to Congress, "having due regard for the rights of said companies named herein," imply that Congress shall not take the property of the companies for nothing or deprive them of their rights, but Congress may direct and control them in the use and exercise of the same, because the corporations agreed that Congress might do so. The words "add to, alter, amend, or repeal this act" must mean something; they must have some effect. What other can they have than that I have assigned them? I cannot see.

The act of 1864 is by its terms amendatory of the act of 1862, and the two must be construed together as one act. This is the plain legal effect, and the Supreme Court so decided in Kansas Pacific Company vs. Prescott, 16 Wall., 603. It is provided by the twenty-second section of the act of 1864 "that Congress may at any time alter, amend, or repeal this act." This reservation of power is as broad as language can make it. The two acts being in effect one and construed together, this reservation of power must apply to both acts—this is the legal effect and the manifest intention of Congress. Can any one suppose that it was intended to reserve power to repeal the act of 1864 alone? To repeal the act of 1864 would leave the act of 1862 in many respects inoperative. Then this clause applies to both acts, reserves to Congress the fullest power to "at any time alter, amend, or repeal this [both] act." It is not proposed to take from the companies any property or money; it is only proposed to direct and control them in the exercise of their rights. This they have agreed that Congress may do, and there cannot therefore be any impairment of right.

It seems to me that these views are reasonable and just, that I have stated the law as it arises upon the two acts under discussion. I beg now to cite some authorities in support of the views I have submitted, and especially to show to what extent the power reserved to the Legislature in the charters of corporations may be exercised.

I cite first, Pierce on the Law of Railways. At page 36 he says:

The power to amend, alter, or repeal the charter may be reserved by the Legislature by a provision to that effect inserted therein, or in a general law declared applicable to all acts of incorporation afterward passed; and the right of the Legislature to alter or repeal the charter is thus made a part of the contract. The charter of the company is, by such a reservation, subject to any reasonable amendment or alteration which the Legislature may make, and any reasonable additional obligations may be imposed on the company. Thus, it may be required by virtue of such reservation to abandon the use of steam-power in propelling its cars through cities, or to raise or lower highways where its track crosses them when directed by the municipal authorities. The Legislature under this power may increase the liability of the stockholders, who will not thereby be exonerated from liability on their subscriptions for stock. The subscriber has been held not to be released, where the Legislature, in pursuance of such a reservation, granted to the company the power to change its route. There being a general statute of Missouri reserving the power to alter or amend acts of incorporation, an act of its Legislature making companies previously incorporated liable to laborers employed by contractors for the work done by them on their roads has been held constitutional.

That is the general law as laid down by an elementary writer in this country on this subject. In the case of The Northern Railroad Company vs. Miller, 10 Barbour, 292, the court say:

It was competent for the State, having the power to grant or to withhold the charter, to annex such condition to the grant, or to make such reservation as it pleased. The directors, trustees, or other managing agents, by whatever name they are called, by accepting the charter became bound by this condition or reservation; and every individual who subscribes to the stock of the company thereby makes himself a party to the contract, subject to the conditions and reservations of the charter. In effect he stipulates, at the time he subscribes, that the Legislature may alter or repeal the law, and thus change the obligation of his subscription or defeat it altogether. It cannot therefore with truth be said that the amendatory act, which is complained of in this case, was an alteration of the defendant's contract without his assent. It was merely such alteration as he himself, by becoming a party to the contract, had agreed that the Legislature might make. He is as much bound by it as if he had signed a petition to the Legislature requesting the passage of the act in question. Whatever modification is thus effected in the obligation created by his subscription is made by his own agreement, entered into at the moment he became a party to the contract, and is as binding upon him as if it had been accomplished by his own solicitation and procurement. It surely cannot be necessary to cite authorities to prove that what a man authorizes another to do is as obligatory upon him, when done, as if it had been performed by himself.

In Tomlinson vs. Jessup, 15 Wallace, 454, the court say:

The object of the reservation, and of similar reservations in other charters, is to prevent a grant of corporate rights and privileges in a form which will preclude legislative interference with their exercise, if the public interest should at any time require such interference. It is a provision intended to preserve to the State control over its contract with the corporations, which without that provision would be irrevocable and protected from any measures affecting its obligations.

In Miller vs. The State, 15 Wallace, 498, the court state in broad and strong terms the extent of the power. They say:

The reserved power may be exercised, and to almost any extent, to carry into effect the original purposes of the grant or to secure the due administration of its affairs so as to protect the rights of its stockholders and of creditors, and for the proper disposition of the assets.

That is the language of our own Supreme Court, and it is as broad and comprehensive and efficient as language can make it. But cases might be cited indefinitely, all going the full length of the proposed exercise of power as now proposed.

It has been said that the Supreme Court, in the case of the United States vs. Union Pacific Railroad Company, (1 Otto, 72,) have held that Congress could not exercise the power reserved as now proposed. This is a grave misapprehension of the ruling of the court. The court said plainly that Congress in the respect then under consideration had not undertaken to exercise the power, but suggest strongly by implication that it might do it. I read a material extract from the opinion of the court. I shall now read what the court say bearing upon this subject, and I read it because it has been cited over and over again, as conclusive to the point that Congress cannot exercise this power. The court decided to the contrary, as I think; they suggest by implication very strongly that Congress can do it; and this paragraph is material to show that I am correct. The court say:

Another act was subsequently passed by virtue of which this suit was instituted by the appellee. [Act of March 3, 1873, 17 Statutes, page 508, section 2.] It is contended that this act repeals that portion of the charter of the company which contains the provisions we have discussed. But manifestly its purpose was very different. Although it directs the Secretary of the Treasury to withhold all payments to the companies on account of freights and transportation, it at the same time authorizes any company thus affected to bring suit in the Court of Claims for "such freight and transportation;" and in such suit "the right of such company to recover the same upon the law and the facts shall be determined, and also the rights of the United States upon the merits of all the points presented by it in answer thereto by them." This means nothing more or less than the remission to the judicial tribunals of the question whether this company and others similarly situated have the right to recover from the Government one-half of what they earned by transportation; and this question is to be determined upon its merits.

The merits of such a question are determined when the effect of the charter is ascertained and declared. It is hardly necessary to say that it would have been idle to authorize a suit, had Congress intended to repeal the provision on which alone it could be maintained.

Is it not plain to the simplest mind that what the court said was, that Congress had not in that case undertaken to exercise the power, and that they suggest strongly by implication that Congress may exercise it? So it appears conclusively that Congress has lawful power to pass the bill proposed by the Committee on the Judiciary, and one more stringent if deemed necessary.

Then ought Congress to exercise this power and in the way proposed? If we consider the relations of these corporations to the Government, their history, their vast debts, their circumstances, their earnings, and the disposition of them, their practices and manifest, studied purpose not to make any reasonable provision for paying the debt due the Government, it seems to me that there can be only an affirmative answer to the question just propounded.

I propose now to bring to the attention of the Senate some considerations that, in my judgment, point strongly to the necessity for prompt and vigorous action on the part of Congress toward these corporations. By virtue of the acts of Congress just referred to the Union Pacific Railroad Company was authorized to construct and maintain a railroad and telegraph line from a point on the one hundredth meridian of longitude west from Greenwich in the Territory

By virtue of the same acts the Central Pacific Railroad Company—a corporation created and existing under the laws of the State of California—was authorized to construct a road and telegraph line from San Francisco to the eastern boundary of California, there to connect with the railroad and telegraph line of the Union Pacific Railroad Company, the two to make one continuous line of road, which continuous line is 1,776.18 miles in length.

In aid of the purposes provided for in said acts other companies of less magnitude and importance were authorized by them, to wit: the Kansas Pacific, the Central Branch Union Pacific, the Western Pacific, and the Sioux City and Pacific.

The Government granted the right of way through the public lands "to said company [naming the Union Pacific Railroad Company and the others as well] for the construction of said railroad and telegraph line;" "the right, power, and authority" was given "said company to take from the public lands adjacent to the line of said road earth, stone, timber, and other materials for the construction thereof; said right of way is granted to said railroad to the extent of two hundred feet in width on each side of said railroad where it may pass over the public lands, including all necessary grounds for stations, buildings, workshops and depots, machine-shops, switches, side-tracks turn-tables, and water-stations."

of aiding in the construction of said railroad and telegraph line, and to secure the safe and speedy transportation of the mails, troops, munitions of war and public stores thereon, every alternate section of public lands, designated by odd numbers, to the amount of five [increased to ten] alternate sections per mile on each side of said railroad, on the line thereof and within the limits of ten miles on each side of said road," &c. All mineral lands were excepted, except that timber on the same and coal and iron in them were granted and not excepted. This grant of lands to the several companies mentioned embraced about thirty millions of acres. In a letter dated March 8, 1876, the Commissioner of the General Land Office says:

1. The amount of land to which each company is supposed to be entitled under acts of July 1, 1862, and July 2, 1864, is as follows:

	Acres.
Union Pacific.....	12,000,000
Central Pacific, including late Western Pacific, now consolidated.....	9,100,000
Kansas Pacific.....	6,000,000
Denver Pacific.....	1,100,000
Central Branch Union Pacific.....	245,166
Burlington and Missouri River, in Nebraska.....	2,441,600
Sioux City and Pacific.....	45,000

These figures are from approximate estimates merely, the adjustment of the grants not having been so nearly completed as to justify an attempt to state accurately the amount of lands inuring to each.

By virtue of the acts mentioned "for the purposes" in them mentioned and specified, bonds of the United State were issued to the railroad companies named respectively as follows, to wit:

Name of railway.	Authorizing acts.	Rate of interest.	When payable.	Interest payable.	Principal outstanding.
Central Pacific.....	July 1, 1862, and July 2, 1864.	6 per cent.	30 years from date.	January and July.	$25,885,120.00
Kansas Pacific.....	July 1, 1862, and July 2, 1864.	6 per cent.	30 years from date.	January and July.	6,303,000.00
Union Pacific.....	July 1, 1862, and July 2, 1864.	6 per cent.	30 years from date.	January and July.	27,236,512.00
Central Branch, Union Pacific.....	July 1, 1862, and July 2, 1864.	6 per cent.	30 years from date.	January and July.	1,600,000.00
Western Pacific.....	July 1, 1862, and July 2, 1864.	6 per cent.	30 years from date.	January and July.	1,970,560.00
Sioux City and Pacific.....	July 1, 1862, and July 2, 1864.	6 per cent.	30 years from date.	January and July.	1,628,320.00
Total.....					64,623,512.00

The aggregate of the bonds so issued as appears, is $64,623,512. These bonds were not a gift to the companies; it is expressly provided in the act that, "to secure the repayment to the United States, as hereinafter provided, of the amount of said bonds so issued and delivered to said company, together with all interest thereon which shall have been paid by the United States," that the United States should have a first mortgage on all the property of all kinds of the companies. This mortgage was afterward by the act of 1864 changed to a second mortgage.

It was provided that—

All compensation for services rendered for the Government shall be applied to the payment of said bonds and interest until the whole amount is fully paid. Said company may also pay the United States, wholly or in part, in the same or other bonds, Treasury notes, or other evidences of debt against the United States, to be allowed at par; and after said road is completed, until said bonds and interest are paid, at least 5 per cent. of the net earnings of said road shall also be annually applied to the payment thereof.

This provision was modified by the act of 1864, as follows:

And that only one-half of the compensation for services rendered for the Government by said companies shall be required to be applied to the payment of the bonds issued by the Government in aid of the construction of said roads.

By the act of 1864 the companies named are authorized respectively to "issue their first-mortgage bonds on their respective railroad and telegraph lines to an amount not exceeding the amount of the bonds of the United States, and of even tenor and date, time of maturity, rate and character of interest with the bonds authorized to be issued to said railroad companies respectively."

The first-mortgage-bond debt created by the companies in pursuance of the last-mentioned provision of the act of 1864, is about the same in amount as the amount of the Government bonds issued, and they are a first lien on all the property of the companies.

Under a decision of the Supreme Court United States vs. Union Pacific Railroad Company, 1 Otto, 72, these several companies are not bound to pay the interest which the Government has paid and may pay, until the bonds issued by the Government to the companies shall mature. These bonds will mature about the year 1900.

At the expense of being a little tedious, I deem it important now to read some interesting extracts from a report made to the House of Representatives April 25, 1876, by the Judiciary Committee on the subject of a sinking fund for the railroad companies, to which I have made reference. The committee say:

The railroad companies now claim that they are not bound or liable to pay any of the interest advanced or to be advanced by the Government until the maturity of the "subsidy bonds," thirty years from their date, except as the application of (1) one-half of the charges for transportation and other services may be so applied, with also (2) the application of 5 per cent. annual net earnings of the roads. But these will fall far short of paying the interest.

There is no law which in such cases gives to the United States interest on advances made in paying the interest on the "subsidy bonds," nor, indeed, on any liability of any company to the Government. The effect, therefore, will be, if the claim of the railroad companies prevails, and even if they should at the maturity of the subsidy bonds, about twenty years from this time, then repay any balance of advances, the Government would be without compensation for the use of the money advanced and not so reimbursed. This loss to the Government would in value and amount reach many millions. The Government pays currency interest at 6 per cent. per annum, payable half yearly. Assuming this rate which the Government actually pays as the value, the actual cost to the Treasury of the advances made and to be made, compounding the interest thereon to the maturity of the "subsidy bonds," would be $316,112,571.79, as follows:

Here is an interesting table. This report seems to have been gotten up with great consideration, and I take it it is very accurate. It is a report on the subject of a sinking fund for the several Pacific Railroad Companies made to the House of Representatives during the Forty-fourth Congress by Mr. Lawrence, of Ohio, and it is report No. 440, Forty-fourth Congress, first session. I present the following table which I find in it:

Statement of the amount of bonds issued to the Pacific Railroad Companies, with interest computed thereon half-yearly at 6 per cent. per annum.

The interest in this statement is compounded.
Union Pacific Railroad Company:
Amount of bonds issued.....	$27,236,512.00
Interest due at maturity, September 3, 1897.....	133,230,306.66
Central Pacific Railroad Company:
Amount of bonds issued.....	25,885,120.00
Interest due at maturity, November 18, 1897.....	126,619,733.30
Kansas Pacific Railroad Company:
Amount of bonds issued.....	6,303,000.00
Interest due at maturity, November 17, 1896.....	30,831,774.36
Western Pacific Railroad Company:
Amount of bonds issued.....	1,970,560.00
Interest due at maturity, September 5, 1898.....	9,639,197.41
Sioux City and Pacific Railroad Company:
Amount of bonds issued.....	1,628,320.00
Interest due at maturity, January 1, 1898.....	7,965,095.16
Central Branch Union Pacific Railroad Company:
Amount of bonds issued.....	1,600,000.00
Interest due at maturity, October 20, 1896.....	7,826,564.96
Total principal.....
Total interest.....	$316,112,571.79
Grand total.....

The principal of the "subsidy bonds" is, as already stated, $64,623,512, with an annual interest of $3,877,410.72, which, for the thirty years the bonds are to run from their date, will aggregate $116,322,321.16.

If no part of the interest should be reimbursed by the companies to the Government until the maturity of the subsidy bonds, the actual loss to the public Treasury would be $199,790,250.63, being the difference between the face of the advances, $116,322,321.16, and their amount, with interest thereon compounded, $316,112,571.79.

Let it be remembered that the Government is not only not to be reimbursed until its bonds issued to the companies mature, but not then, until the first-mortgage bonds of the companies are discharged, because they are a first lien. There is no provision made by the companies to pay the vast debt of the Government against them when it shall mature. They have not created any sinking fund or set apart any fund or means whatever with which to do so. They manifest no purpose to do so; and, judging the future by the past, they never will voluntarily make any such provision. In 1865, the president of the Union Pacific Railroad Company broadly intimated that the Government might lose its debt. It now looks as if their purpose was to continue to make large dividends until the Government debt shall mature, and then let their first-mortgage creditors take the roads, or leave the Government to pay the first-mortgage debt and take the roads, the stockholders in the mean time having realized enormous profits in the shape of dividends on stock that cost most of them almost a nominal sum, as will appear presently.

The following extract from the report read from a moment ago will give some notion of what may be expected from the companies if Congress shall not take action. I read from page 19 of the report:

It has already been shown that the Government has been reimbursed from earnings only $5,455,169.53 in a period of nine years, and that the same source will probably not average over half a million of dollars a year.

From what has been said it will be seen that, according to the claim of the companies, the Government cannot expect to realize more than about $800,000 per annum from the 5 per cent. of net earnings.

The total of these two sources, then, on this basis, would be about $1,300,000 per year. But it is not probable the services will continue so large as heretofore.

The total sum realized by the Government to the maturity of the "subsidy bonds," including the amount heretofore received, would reach probably about $36,000,000.

The principal of the subsidy bonds is	$64,623,512
Interest to maturity without compounding or counting any interest on advances of interest	116,322,321
Total claim of Government	180,945,833
The amount provided to meet this, as above stated	36,000,000
Deficiency	144,945,833

And as the law now stands, the Government, unable to collect interest on its dues, and the companies steadily refusing to pay what they concede to be legally and justly payable, with a probability that they will continue to pursue the same course, the real deficiency to meet the acknowledged indebtedness, with interest thereon, would be many millions more, but the exact amount of course cannot be accurately stated.

And if the companies are permitted to go on refusing, as they do, to pay their acknowledged indebtedness, all this will increase the loss to the Government.

There is an imperative necessity for prompt and decisive action to secure the just demands of the Government and to save it from loss.

The president of the Union Pacific Company, in a letter to the Secretary of the Treasury dated February 9, 1875, says:

"The mortgage held by the Government, in its terms and by judicial decision of the United States circuit court, cannot be enforced until the maturity of the bonds, which is near the close of the present century.

"The bonds are accumulating an interest account, also uncollectible until the principal is due. The principal and interest when due will amount to the very large aggregate of over seventy-seven millions of dollars, though the actual amount advanced by the Government was only $27,236,512.

"For this very large amount the Government has only a second mortgage, and if it be allowed to accumulate, without any provision being made to meet it, the company will probably be utterly unable to pay it.

"At the same time it is equally manifest that the Government will be unable to collect it, except upon the assumption that it will advance the money to discharge prior mortgages, and run the road on Government account—a policy which wise statesmanship could not advise.

"By standing still, therefore, the company has a load of debt accumulating for which no provision is made, and the Government is drifting further and further from the opportunity to secure a just return for its advances. To do nothing is to injure both the Government and the company, perhaps irretrievably to both."

The committee in their report say further:

This statement is fully justified by the existing indebtedness of the company. The bonded indebtedness of the Union Pacific Company is $79,457,912, of which there is owing to the United States for "subsidy bonds" $27,236,512. Of the residue, $52,221,400, about $27,236,512 are first-mortgage bonds, and the residue are income, sinking fund, and land grant bonds, the latter secured by mortgage on the land grant of the company. It is quite apparent that the road is in a condition in which it never can and never will pay its liabilities to the United States if they are permitted to accumulate until the maturity of the "subsidy bonds." This is the fact, whatever may be its cause.

I read again from page 21:

The lands will doubtless be sold out under the land-grant mortgage. If the stockholders should lose their stock and all bonds be paid but the first-mortgage bonds, this company would, at the maturity of the subsidy bonds, owe as follows:

First-mortgage bonds	$27,236,512
Subsidy bonds due the Government	27,236,512
Interest on subsidy bonds	32,683,814
Total	87,156,838

This is equal to $80,254 per mile. To pay this, the Government may find only a worn-out road, which, put up at auction, would not pay the first-mortgage bonds. And if these should happen to be in the hands of those who now control the road, they would doubtless become the purchasers and sole owners, for the objection to a Government purchase would be so great it would never be made, and there could be no other competitor who would be formidable as a purchaser. If there could be danger of this, the managers of the road could permit the interest to accumulate on the first-mortgage bonds to any amount requisite to secure their purpose to become owners of the road without paying any of its debt to the Government. The necessity for prompt measures to secure the Government cannot be doubted.

I read again from page 29 of the report:

That it is the duty of the companies to provide a sinking fund to meet the payment of the subsidy bonds at maturity, and that there is an urgent necessity for it must be manifest.

The president of the Union Pacific Company, in a letter to the Secretary of the Treasury dated February 9, 1875, says:

"The mortgage held by the Government, in its terms and by judicial decision of the United States circuit court, cannot be enforced until the maturity of the bonds, which is near the close of the present century.

"The bonds are accumulating an interest account, also uncollectible until the principal is due. The principal and interest when due will amount to the very large aggregate of over $77,000,000, though the actual amount advanced by the Government was only $27,236,512.

"For this very large amount the Government has only a second mortgage, and if it be allowed to accumulate without any provision being made to meet it, the company will probably be utterly unable to pay it.

"At the same time it is equally manifest that the Government will be unable to collect it, except upon the assumption that it will advance the money to discharge the prior mortgages and run the road on Government account; a policy which wise statesmanship could not advise.

"By standing still, therefore, the company has a load of debt accumulating for which no provision is made, and the Government is drifting further and further from the opportunity to secure a just return for its advances. To do nothing is to injure both the Government and the company, perhaps irretrievably to both."

The committee proceed and say:

The duty to provide the means of paying these bonds is an obligation prior to any claim of stockholders for dividends, yet the two principal companies are making large dividends and providing no sinking fund.

I now wish to direct attention to what was done with the vast sums of money which these companies got possession of under the legislation to which reference has been made.

The law required that the capital stock of the several companies should be paid for in money at par. In fact, it was paid for at not exceeding thirty cents in the dollar in work on the road. It is said that no cash was paid for the stock of the Union Pacific Railroad Company capital stock, except about $400,000, and it seems it is not certain that sum was paid.

I read from the report of the House Judiciary Committee, at page 18:

Union Pacific Railroad Company.—Stock subscribed, $36,783,000; paid in, $36,762,300. The bonded indebtedness, $79,457,912, of which $27,236,512 is due to the United States.

Central Pacific Railroad Company.—Stock subscribed, $62,608,600; paid in, $51,275,500. Indebtedness, $86,163,681, of which $27,255,680 is due to the United States. This company now comprises, by consolidation, the Western Pacific, the California and Oregon, the San Francisco, Oakland and Alameda, and the San Joaquin Valley Companies, in addition to the original Central Pacific Company.

Central Branch, Union Pacific Company.—Stock subscribed, $1,000,000; paid in, $800,600. Indebtedness, besides $1,600,000 to the United States, is $303,902.63.

Kansas Pacific Company.—Stock subscribed, $9,992,500; paid in, $9,659,950. Total indebtedness, $30,965,975.41, of which $6,303,000 is due the United States.

Sioux City and Pacific Company.—Stock subscribed, $4,478,500; paid in, $1,791,400. Bonded indebtedness, $3,256,320, of which $1,628,320 is due the United States. The floating debt is $60,571.67.

The stock was not in fact paid for as reported. I read from the same report, at page 20, a striking statement, which must strike with great force the mind of every one who wants to do his duty upon this measure:

In a report made to the House on the 20th February, 1873, (House Report No. 78,) by a committee thereof, it was said of the Union Pacific Company:

"That the moneys borrowed by the corporation, under a power given them only to meet the necessities of the construction and endowment of the road, have been distributed in dividends among the corporators; that the stock was issued not to men who paid for it at par in money, but who paid for it at not more than thirty cents on the dollar in road-making; that of the Government directors, some of them have neglected their duties, and others have been interested in the transactions by the provisions of the organic law have been evaded; that at least one of the commissioners appointed by the President has been directly bribed to betray his trust by the gift of $25,000; that the chief engineer of the road was largely interested in the contracts for its construction; and that there has been an attempt to prevent the exercise of the reserved power in Congress by inducing influential members of Congress to become interested in the profits of the transaction. So that of the safeguards above enumerated none seems to be left but the sense of public duty of the corporators."

The report shows that in fact the men engaged in this enterprise never risked a dollar of their own capital by the possibility of loss, and that they not only constructed the road from the resources which came from the Government, but that they made enormous profits from these, thereby leaving the United States with no adequate security for the reimbursement of the subsidy bonds.

I read further from the same report, beginning at page 14:

From this it will be seen these companies, on their own showing, are making large profits, and are abundantly able to pay and indemnify the Government against future loss, and pay liberal dividends besides on the par value of stock which, as has been shown by a committee of the House as to the Union Pacific Company, cost its original holders "not more than thirty cents on the dollar in road-making, which road-making itself paid enormous profits—profits realized through the notorious Credit Mobilier of America. These net earnings, as reported by the companies, are over 16 per cent. on the nominal capital stock of the Union Pacific Company, or, in fact, about 50 per cent. for the year 1875 on the real cost of the stock; while as to the Central Pacific Company, the net earnings are nearly 15 per cent. on the nominal capital stock, and how much on the real cost of the stock is not disclosed.

I wish now to read a striking extract or two from a report made to the House of Representatives by a select committee on the 20th of February, 1873. This is a report made by Mr. Wilson. It is report No. 78, Forty-second Congress, third session. The committee say:

The Government never consented to trust its property to men who had not put their own money into the enterprise. It never consented to take security for its reimbursement at the end of thirty years, solely on the property it had advanced. It never expected to rely for the performance of these great public duties upon a company whose debts equalled its whole property. The law-making power, if its mandates are to be obeyed or respected hereafter, cannot accept as an excuse for disobedience to its express directions, by the corporation it has created, that the members of that corporation have decided that those directions were unreasonable and unnecessary.

And this is the important point in the extract I am now reading:

In this case the provision of the charter requiring the stock to be paid for in money has been grossly violated; because, as is apparent, nearly the whole of the stock that has been issued represents no value to the railroad company; or, to state it differently, was issued without any consideration whatsoever.

I read further from page 21 of the same report:

The result of these proceedings was this:

1. While the charter of the Credit Mobilier required its affairs to be managed by a board of directors and its principal business office to be in Philadelphia, the actual conduct of its affairs was wholly by the men acting as a board of trustees and in the city of New York, so that this unlawful arrangement attempted to disguise, and did in effect disguise, these persons by means of a fictitious and pretended and not a real use of the corporate powers of the Credit Mobilier.

2. While the charter of the Union Pacific Railroad Company required its corporate powers to be wielded by a board of fifteen directors, ten of whom should be bona fide holders of stock and should be elected by stockholders representing capital which had been actually paid in full and in money, this contrivance virtually placed all the power and control of said railroad corporation, its property and franchises, in the hands of the same persons, and beyond the management provided by law, thereby disguising and intending to disguise an unlawful seizure of the powers of the company, an unlawful use of its name in the issue of stock, bonds, and scrip, and an unlawful distribution of its property among the parties.

3. While the United States subordinated its own lien to secure reimbursement of the loan of its bonds to a mortgage to secure the bonds of the company for a like amount for the purpose of constructing the road, moneys have been in fact borrowed under the privilege so conferred and distributed as dividends.

4. The statute requiring the capital stock to be paid for in money at par, it has in fact been paid at not exceeding thirty cents on the dollar in road building, excepting, perhaps, the sum of about $400,000.

5. Instead of securing a solvent, powerful, well-endowed company, able to perform its important public functions without interruption in times of commercial disaster and in times of war, and able to maintain its impartiality and neutrality in dealing with all connecting lines, it is now weak and poor, kept from bankruptcy only by the voluntary aid of a few capitalists who are interested to maintain it, and liable to fall into the control of shrewd and adroit managers, and to become an appendage to some one of the railroad lines of the East.

To give some notion of the cost of building the Union Pacific Railroad and how the Government was robbed, I read the following further extract from the same report on page 17:

In this connection the committee calls attention to the following facts:
First-mortgage bonds issued.....	$27,213,000 00
Sold at a discount of.....	3,494,991 23
Net proceeds.....	23,718,008 77
Government bonds issued.....	$27,236,512 00
Sold at a discount of.....	91,348 72
	27,145,163 38
Aggregate net proceeds of both classes.....	$50,863,172 05
Cost of whole road to the contractors.....	50,730,958 94
	142,213 11

And attention is also called to the time of the receipt of Government bonds, as shown by schedule thereof set forth in the evidence.

It appears, then, speaking in round numbers, that the cost of the road was $50,000,000 which cost was wholly reimbursed from the proceeds of the Government bonds and first-mortgage bonds; and that from the stock, the income bonds, and land-grant bonds, the builders received in cash value at least $23,000,000 as profit, being a percentage of about 45 per cent. on the entire cost.

I read further from pages 4, 7, and 8, showing the spirit of what was called the Hoxie contract:

The first contract for the construction of the road was made with one H. M. Hoxie, who seems to have been a person of little pecuniary responsibility. His proposal to build and equip one hundred miles of the railroad and telegraph is dated New York, August 8, 1864, signed H. M. Hoxie, by H. C. Crane, attorney. It was accepted by the company September 23, 1864. On the 30th of September, 1864, Hoxie agreed to assign this contract to Thomas C. Durant, who was then vice-president and director of the Union Pacific Railroad Company, or such parties as he might designate. On the 4th of October, 1864, the contract was assigned to the one hundredth meridian, an additional one hundred and forty-six and forty-five hundredths miles, the agreement for extension being signed by Crane as attorney of Hoxie. Hoxie was an employé of the company at the time, and Mr. Crane, who signed as Hoxie's attorney, was Durant's "confidential man," as Durant himself expresses it.

By this contract and its extension, Hoxie agreed to build two hundred and forty-six and forty-five hundredths miles of road, to furnish money on the securities of the company, to subscribe $1,000,000 to the capital stock, and he was to receive $30,000 per mile for the work.

On the 11th day of October, 1864, an agreement was entered into by Durant, Bushnell, Lombard, McComb, all directors of the Union Pacific Railroad Company, and Gray, a stockholder, to take from Hoxie the assignment of his contract, (which assignment he had previously bound himself to make to such persons as Durant should designate,) and to contribute $1,600,000 for the purpose of carrying the contract out.

This Hoxie contract and its assignment were a device by which the persons who were the active managers and controllers of the Union Pacific Railroad Company caused said corporation to make a contract with themselves for the construction of a portion of its road, by which also they got possession of all the resources which it would be entitled to by the completion of said portion, and by which they evaded, or sought to evade, the requirement that the capital stock should be fully paid in money, by substituting for such payment a fictitious or nominal payment in road building and equipment, each share being treated as being worth much less than its par value. That this was the substance of the transaction will more fully appear when we come to speak of a subsequent arrangement of the same nature, but on a larger scale.

On the 26th day of March, 1864, by an act of the Legislature of the State of Pennsylvania, the name was changed to "The Credit Mobilier of America."

By the terms of purchase of the charter, an agency was to be established in the city of New York, and when the subscription was made it was upon the condition that the full powers of the board of directors should be delegated to the New York agency, and that a railway bureau should be established at said agency, of five managers, three to be directors of the company, (afterward changed to seven managers,) who should have the management of railway contracts, subject to the approval of the president. By these means this Pennsylvania corporation, so far as the management of its affairs was concerned, substantially expatriated itself, and, clothed with the extraordinary powers acquired from the State of Pennsylvania, it proceeded to take upon itself the control of the Union Pacific Railroad Company in the manner following:

It purchased the outstanding stock of that corporation, amounting to about $2,180,000, on which about $218,000 had been paid to the railroad company, the Credit Mobilier paying for this stock the amount already paid. At the time of this purchase the shares of Union Pacific stock were $1,000 each. After the act of 1864 was passed these shares were canceled, and a release was made in shares of $100 each. The release was made to the stockholders of the Credit Mobilier, and by this process the stockholders of the two corporations were made identical. By this means the persons who under the guise of a corporation that was to take the contract to build the road held complete control of the corporation for which the road was to be built.

These things accomplished, they took charge of construction under the Hoxie contract, and the portion of the road lying between Omaha and the one hundredth meridian was constructed under it.

This contract cost the Union Pacific Railroad Company.....	$12,974,416 24
It cost the Credit Mobilier.....	7,806,183 33
Profit.....	5,168,233 91

This profit is a profit in stock and bonds estimated at par. Their actual value will appear hereafter.

The next event in this history is as follows, and it is stated here to show the animus of those who were managing this great trust:

The Hoxie contract had been completed, finishing the road to the one hundredth meridian, a distance of two hundred and forty-six and forty-five hundredths miles. An agreement was then made, (November 10, 1866,) by Thomas C. Durant, vice-president of the Union Pacific Railroad Company, with a Mr. Boomer for the construction of one hundred and fifty-three and thirty-five hundredths miles west from the one hundredth meridian. By the terms of this agreement Boomer was to be paid $19,500 per mile for that portion between the one hundredth meridian and the east bank of the North Platte, and for that portion lying west of the North Platte within the limits of the agreement $20,000 per mile, the bridge over the North Platte, and station-buildings equipment, &c., to be an additional charge.

This contract was never ratified by the company, but under it the work progressed, and fifty-eight miles of road had been completed and accepted by the Government. The books of the company fail to show what this fifty-eight miles had cost the company; but from the best evidence that could be procured your committee believe that the cost had not been to exceed $27,500 per mile for construction and equipment, the excess over the contract price being for station-houses, equipment, &c. Inasmuch as the charter required that the station-houses, equipment, &c., should be built and furnished before acceptance by the Government, and inasmuch as the records of the Department show that the fifty-eight miles had been accepted, your committee feel warranted in finding that this had been done and that the cost of the whole was not to exceed $27,500 per mile. But notwithstanding this, on the 5th day of January, 1867, the board of directors by a resolution extended the Hoxie contract over this fifty-eight miles of then completed road, thereby proposing to pay to the Credit Mobilier the sum of $22,500 per mile for this fifty-eight miles, amounting to the sum of $1,345,000, without any consideration whatever.

The following is the resolution of date January 5, 1867:

"Resolved, That the Union Pacific Railroad Company will, and do hereby, consider the Hoxie contract extended to the point already completed, namely, three hundred and five miles west from Omaha, and that the officers of this company are hereby authorized to settle with the Credit Mobilier at $50,000 per mile for the additional fifty-eight miles."

That it was proposed to give the Credit Mobilier this profit, if that is the proper word to be used in such a connection, is verified by the fact that subsequently the sum of $1,104,000 was paid to the Credit Mobilier on account of this fifty-eight miles, for the construction of which it never had even the semblance of a contract. Of this $1,104,000 further mention will be made hereafter.

I read further from page 13, of same report, to show the like spirit of the "Oakes Ames contract:"

This contract extended over one hundred and thirty-eight miles of road completed and accepted. No work was done under it until after its assignment. That portion already completed had cost not to exceed $27,500 per mile, and by embracing this one hundred and thirty-eight miles in it these trustees derived a "profit," if such a term is admissible in such a connection, which enabled them to make a dividend among the stockholders in less than sixty days after the assignment, namely, on the 12th of December, 1867, as follows: 60 per cent. in first-mortgage bonds of the Union Pacific Railroad Company, $2,244,000; 60 per cent. in stock of the Union Pacific Railroad Company, $2,244,000.

This was mainly, if not entirely, derived from the excess of the contract price over what the one hundred and thirty-eight miles had cost.

The trustees proceeded to construct the road under this contract, and from a balance-sheet taken from the books it appears that the cost to the

Railroad company was.....	$37,140,102 74
And the cost to the contractors was.....	27,285,141 99

-------------	---------------

The nature of this profit, as in case of that on the Hoxie contract, will appear hereafter.

Again I read a further extract from pages 13 and 14 in further illustration of the spirit of the corporators:

DAVIS CONTRACT.

This was a contract made with J. W. Davis, a man of but little, if any, pecuniary ability, (and not expected to perform the contract,) for the construction of that part of the road beginning at the western terminus of the "Ames contract," and extending to the western terminus of the road, a distance of one hundred and twenty-five and twenty-three hundredths miles. It was upon the same terms as the Ames contract, and was assigned to the same board of trustees. Under it the residue of the road was constructed, and, from a balance-sheet taken from the books of the railroad company, it appears that it—

Cost the railroad company.....	$23,431,768 10
And, from a balance-sheet taken from the books of the trustees, that it cost the contractors.....	15,620,933 62

-------------	--------------

Your committee present the following summary of cost of this road to the railroad company and to the contractors, as appears by the books:

Cost to railroad company.
Hoxie contract.....	$12,974,416 24
Ames contract.....	57,140,102 94
Davis contract.....	23,431,768 10
Total.....	93,546,287 28

Now see the other side of the books:

Cost to contractors.
Hoxie contract.....	$7,806,183 33
Ames contract.....	27,285,141 99
Davis contract.....	15,620,933 62
	50,730,958 94

	42,823,328 34
--	---------------

To this should be added amount paid Credit Mobilier on account of fifty-eight miles.....	1,104,000 00

Total profit on construction.....	43,925,328 34

I might spend the day in reading extracts from these reports, all going to show the enormity of the frauds practiced upon the Government. Surely what I have read will serve to show that Congress ought to hasten to do now what ought to have been done long since—to protect the Government against a corporation that has thus robbed it.

The testimony against the Central Pacific Railroad Company is not so complete, but the practices of that company have been far from what was just and fair toward the Government. I read an extract from a speech made by Hon. William A. Piper, of California, in the House of Representatives, April 8, 1876. Among other things he says:

The Central Pacific Railroad of California in 1870 became consolidated with the Western Pacific, the San Joaquin Valley, and the San Francisco, Oakland and Alameda Railroad Companies, under the name of the Central Pacific Railroad.

With a desire to own every pass and natural avenue to the Pacific, the directors, by well-known means, also secured control of the Southern Pacific Railroad Company, a corporation formed October 11, 1870, by the consolidation of the San Francisco and San José, the Southern Pacific of California, the Santa Clara and Pajaro Valley, and the California Railroad Companies. The Southern Pacific Railroad of California should not be confounded with the Southern Pacific Railroad of Texas.

The schemes of these men to secure immense profits in the construction of roads to the Pacific were similar to those of the Credit Mobilier of America.

He then refers to a suit in California relating to the Central Pacific, and says:

Under these circumstances, the account given by Samuel Brannan, the plaintiff in this suit, may be considered as substantially true. He asserts that C. P. Huntington, Leland Stanford, Mark Hopkins, Charles Crocker, E. B. Crocker, and others, being a majority of the directors of the Central Pacific, formed themselves into a company styled the Contract and Finance Company, for the purpose of taking contracts for the construction of the road at rates largely in excess of the sum at which the work could have been let out to responsible parties. The said directors then entered into a contract with themselves, as member of this fictitious corporation, for the construction of the Central Pacific, and transferred to the Contract and Finance Company the entire subsidies of land, money, and bonds granted by the United States, the States of California and Nevada, and various municipal corporations of California in aid of the enterprise. They also granted to Wells, Fargo & Co. the exclusive right of running express trains for the transportation of freight, packages, and bullion over the Central Pacific, and received as pay for the concession stock in that company. They also bought up the stock of competing railroads, and, receiving the subsidy bonds from the United States, appropriated to themselves the profits of said roads. They so managed their operations, principally through the Contract and Finance Company, as to earn immense profits, recklessly increasing the cost of building the Central Pacific to double or treble the amount necessary.

In order to obtain these immense grants of land and money, and to procure the reorganization of the competing railroads purchased by them, and to secure their reelection as officers thereof, they expended vast sums of money in lobbying; and in carrying out their schemes generally they rode rough-shod over the people of the Pacific coast, using every conceivable mode of oppression. These grave charges are substantially confirmed by the reluctant testimony of Richard Franchot and C. P. Huntington, given in the early part of 1873 before the special committee of this House appointed to investigate the operations of the Central Pacific.

These companies now have the ability to make reasonable provision to pay the debt of the Government. Their earnings are immense. They make larger dividends than any railroad companies in this country. If the bill before the Senate should become a law, they can, as appears by the report of the committee, pay to the stockholders from 4½ to 6 per cent. dividends on the nominal value of the capital stock. And when we consider the market value of the stock, and then further what it really cost most of the stockholders, such dividends would be enormous.

The bill of the Committee on the Judiciary is compulsory in its provisions. This we have seen is absolutely essential. It makes adequate—not more—provision for paying the debt of the Government, principal and interest, when it shall mature, leaving the stockholders reasonable, under the circumstances extravagant dividends. And in case the earnings of the company shall not in any year be adequate for the purposes of the bill, ample provision is made for giving relief. The bill requires no duty, imposes no obligation impossible of performance; it is reasonable and practicable in all its provisions.

With all due respect to the Committee on Railroads, I must say that the bill reported by them, by its terms and according to their own showing, is inadequate to the due protection of the rights of the Government. It does not provide for the payment of the debt of the Government at maturity, it is not compulsory, and in view of what we have seen of the practices and spirit of these corporations, it is practically an indefinite postponement of the rights of the Government and the people. It is wholly unacceptable, if it is seriously the purpose of Congress to afford substantial protection for the Government.

Mr. President, the great importance of the subject under consideration must be my apology for detaining the Senate so long. Congress has certainly been remiss in reference to it in the past; I trust it will be so no longer. Justice, right, prudence, the country, alike demand our prompt and efficient action.

Mr. THURMAN. The Senator from Minnesota, [Mr. WINDOM,] the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, desires that this bill be laid aside informally, not to lose its order, that the Senate may take up the consular and diplomatic appropriation bill.

Mr. HILL. I should like to get the floor for to-morrow on the pending bill.

Mr. THURMAN. Take it now.

Mr. HILL. Very well.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. MITCHELL in the chair.) The Senator from Georgia will be recognized as entitled to the floor to-morrow when the consideration of this bill shall be resumed.

Mr. THURMAN. I consent that the bill be laid aside informally in order that the appropriation bill may be taken up.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair hears no objection, and that will be the understanding.

Mr. THURMAN. I wish to say, however, that I hope it will be the pleasure of the Senate to proceed with the funding bill with somewhat more of industry than it has heretofore. I have no complaints to make; but I hope that we may be able to get to a vote on the bill by the last of this week or very early next week, and therefore that those who desire to speak upon it will be content that there may be two or even three speeches made in a day hereafter. I only express this as my wish; of course, it will be for the Senate to say. My friend from Connecticut [Mr. EATON] says it ought not to be hurried, as it is an important measure; but if it is to pass at this session of Congress we ought not to spend too much time on it. I shall not make any unreasonable pressure, and every Senator will have an opportunity to speak on it who desires. I do not propose to take the time now, but will only say that I will request the Senate to come to a vote on this bill, if not at the end of this week, then by the middle of next week at the farthest.

Mr. MATTHEWS. When I addressed the Senate on the subject of the funding bill I announced my intention on taking my seat to move that the bill reported by the Railroad Committee should be substituted for the bill reported by the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. THURMAN. I thought my colleague had made that motion.

Mr. MATTHEWS. But the motion was not formally entered, and I desire to have it so entered in order that that may be the pending question.

Mr. THURMAN. Let that be moved now.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. By unanimous consent, the amendment reported from the Committee on Railroads will be considered as the pending question.

The amendment of Mr. MATTHEWS is to strike out all after the enacting clause of the bill and insert:

That in order to establish a sinking fund for the purpose of liquidating the claims of the Government on account of the bonds advanced under said act of July 1, 1862, and the acts amending the same or supplemental thereto, to the Central Pacific Railroad Company of California, and the Western Pacific Railroad Company, and to the Union Pacific Railroad Company, the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States is hereby authorized to carry to the credit of a sinking fund for the Central Pacific Railroad Company, a corporation organized and existing under the laws of the State of California, the successor by consolidation of the said Central Pacific Railroad Company of California and the Western Pacific Railroad Company, and to the credit of a sinking fund for the Union Pacific Railroad Company, the amount due, or which may be due, the said companies respectively, for the carriage and transportation of the mails, troops, munitions of war, supplies, and public stores for the Government, under the acts aforesaid, up to and including the 31st day of March, 1878, which, if not amounting at said date to the sum of $1,000,000, shall be made up by the respective companies to that sum each.

SEC. 2. That the said Central Pacific Railroad Company and the Union Pacific Railroad Company shall each pay into the Treasury of the United States, to the credit of said sinking fund, either in lawful money or in any bonds or securities of the United States Government, at par, annually, the sum of $1,000,000, in equal semi-annual installments, on the 1st day of April and October in each year, commencing on the 1st day of October, 1878, and continuing such payments until the 1st day of October, in the year 1900. Interest on all sums placed to the credit of the sinking fund shall be credited and added thereto semi-annually, at the rate of 6 per cent. per annum. Any balance remaining due from either of said companies at the date last aforesaid, after deducting the amount standing to the credit of said sinking fund from the amount of said bonds, together with all interest thereon which shall have been paid by the United States, and interest on the principal of said bonds from the maturity thereof, respectively, to the 1st day of October, A. D. 1900, shall be then divided into fifty equal semi-annual installments, to be paid by said companies respectively, one of which shall be paid on the 1st day of April, and one on the 1st day of October in each year, with all accrued interest from October 1, A. D. 1900, on said balance remaining unpaid at the date of maturity of each installment at the same rate per annum paid by the United States on the larger part of its public debt, on the 1st day of January preceding the date of payment of the several installments: Provided, however, That on the failure or refusal of said companies, or either of them, to make any payment in accordance with the provisions of this act for the period of six months, then the provisions hereof in regard to the liquidation of said bonds and interest shall thenceforth, at the option of the United States, become inoperative as to such defaulting company; and the rights and powers of the United States in relation thereto, under the acts to which this is amendatory, shall be in full force and effect as if this act had not been passed, except as hereinafter provided. Or the United States may, in case of default aforesaid, retain as payment on account thereof to the credit of said sinking fund any sum or sums that may accrue to said company in default on account of the carriage and transportation of the mails, troops, munitions of war, supplies, and public stores until said default is removed.

SEC. 3. That the payments so to be made by said companies shall be in lieu of all payments required from said companies under said act and the amendments thereto in relation to the reimbursement to the Government of the bonds so issued to said corporations: Provided, however, That said companies shall not in any manner be released from their present liabilities to keep the said railroads and telegraph lines constructed under the acts of Congress aforesaid in repair and use, and to transmit dispatches over said telegraph lines, and transport mails, troops, munitions of war, supplies, and public stores upon said railroads for the Government, whenever required to do so by any Department thereof, at fair and reasonable rates of compensation, (said rates not to exceed the amounts paid by private parties for the same kind of service,) the whole amount of which shall be paid by the Government to said companies on the adjustment of the accounts therefor, and that the Government shall at all times have the preference in the use of the same for all the purposes aforesaid.

SEC. 4. That the mortgage of the Government created by the fifth section of the act of July 1, 1862, amended by the act of July 3, 1864, shall not be in any way impaired or released by the operations of this act until the whole amount of the principal of said bonds, with the interest thereon paid by the United States as aforesaid, shall be fully paid; but said mortgage shall remain in full force and virtue, and, upon the failure of either of said companies to perform the obligations imposed upon them by this act, said mortgage may also be enforced against such defaulting company for any such default; the Government, however, duly crediting and allowing to the company upon said mortgage all payments which may have been made in part execution of this act, and interest thereon to be credited and added thereto semi-annually as hereinbefore provided.

Sec. 5. That this act shall take effect upon its acceptance by said railroad companies, or, if accepted by only one of said companies, then as to the company so accepting the same, which acceptance shall be filed with the Secretary of the Treasury within four months from the passage of this act, and shall show that said company or said companies have agreed to the same at a meeting of stockholders; and if said companies shall make punctual payment of the sums herein provided for and perform all the conditions hereof, this act shall be deemed and construed to be a final settlement between the Government and the company or companies so performing the same, in reference to all matters relating to a reimbursement to the Government by said companies; but in case of failure so to do, Congress may at any time alter, amend, or repeal this act as to such company so making default.

Sec. 6. That all acts and parts of acts inconsistent with this act are hereby repealed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. WINDOM. I am prepared to take up the consular and diplomatic bill so far as the Committee on Appropriations is concerned, but the Senator from Maine, [Mr. HAMLIN,] the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations, requested this morning that the bill should go over until to-morrow. He wishes to make some suggestions with reference to it, and as the request came from the chairman of that committee whose duties are peculiarly related to the consular and diplomatic bill, I consented that it might go over until to-morrow.

Mr. THURMAN. Then the Senator from Minnesota will not call up the consular and diplomatic bill until after the Senator from Georgia [Mr. HILL] has been heard on the funding bill.

Mr. WINDOM. We will pursue the usual course in reference to it. I ask that it may be taken up by consent after the Senator from Georgia shall have concluded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That will be the understanding.

Mr. THURMAN. That will be the understanding, and then the funding bill will be passed over informally.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. GEORGE M. ADAMS, its Clerk, announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bill and joint resolution; and they were thereupon signed by the Vice-President:

A bill (S. No. 525) to authorize the Worthington and Sioux Falls Railroad Company to extend its road into the Territory of Dakota, to the village of Sioux Falls; and

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 133) to prescribe the time for the payment of the tax on distilled spirits, and for other purposes.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. BAYARD. Understanding that the Senator from Minnesota will call up his bill to-morrow, I move now that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After one hour and fifty-six minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at five o'clock and ten minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, March 26, 1878.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. P. HARRISON.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. FINLEY. I rise to a personal explanation. On yesterday when the votes were taken on the motions of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. GOODE] and the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. DURHAM] to suspend the rules I announced a pair of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CALKINS] with the gentleman from New Jersey, [Mr. ROSS.] I did so at the request of the gentleman from Indiana. He said to me he was going away, and that he and Mr. ROSS were paired and that he desired I should make the announcement. I notice by this morning's RECORD that Mr. ROSS voted on each of those occasions. He desires me to say the pair he had with the gentleman from Indiana, as he understood it, was on political questions, and that the questions on which the votes were taken yesterday were not political questions, and were not questions on which he was paired. I desire to state this in justice to the gentleman from New Jersey. I simply did what I was requested to do by the gentleman from Indiana.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman desire that the name of the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. ROSS] shall continue in the record of yeas and nays?

Mr. CALKINS. I do. I desire to say, Mr. Speaker, that I did ask the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FINLEY] to announce the pair between myself and the gentleman from New Jersey, [Mr. ROSS.] I did understand that the pair extended to these questions. Mr. ROSS did not so understand; and I now relieve him from any embarrassment he may feel on that question, and ask that his name may stand as recorded.

W. F. AND G. E. WILLARD.

Mr. ALDRICH, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4099) for the relief of William F. Willard and George E. Willard, of Ferrysburg, Michigan; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on War Claims, and ordered to be printed.

L. L. RICE.

Mr. MONROE, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4100) authorizing L. L. Rice to locate land warrant No. 79099, issued under act of March 3, 1855, in his own name, or to sell and assign the same; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

SALE OF TIMBER LANDS.

Mr. PAGE, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4101) for the sale of timber lands in the States of California and Oregon and in Washington Territory; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

UNITED STATES BARGE OFFICE, NEW YORK.

Mr. MULLER, by unanimous consent, submitted resolutions and accompanying documents relative to the construction of a United States barge office on the battery extension in the city of New York; which were referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

PROTECTION AGAINST UTE INDIANS.

Mr. PATTERSON, of Colorado. I ask unanimous consent to submit for present consideration the resolution which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War is hereby requested to communicate to this House what steps, if any, have been taken to protect residents of the western part of Colorado from any threatened outbreak on the part of the Ute Indians; and also whether or not the present military post known as Fort Garland is located so as to afford the best protection from such Indians; and if not, at what point such a post should be established to afford such protection; also, whether or not with the establishment of a new post for protection against the Utes the maintenance of Fort Garland would be longer necessary, with such other information possessed by the Department as is pertinent to the subject.

Mr. HALE. I object if this is to occupy any time.

Mr. PATTERSON, of Colorado. It will not take any time.

Mr. HALE. If the gentleman can put it right through without taking up time, I will not object.

The SPEAKER. The resolution will be again read.

The resolution was again read.

There being no objection, the resolution was adopted.

Mr. PATTERSON, of Colorado, moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

JOSEPH E. WILSON.

Mr. GIDDINGS, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on War Claims, reported back the bill (H. R. No. 670) for the relief of Joseph E. Wilson, and moved that the committee be discharged from the further consideration of the same, and that it be referred to the Committee of Claims.

The motion was agreed to.

SUFFERERS BY GRASSHOPPERS.

Mr. FINLEY, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on Agriculture, reported, as a substitute for House bill No. 1468, to provide for the relief of persons suffering from the ravages of grasshoppers, and House bill No. 1739, for distribution of seeds for sufferers by grasshoppers, a bill (H. R. No. 4102) for the relief of persons in the county of Taos, New Mexico; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and ordered to be printed.

HENRY W. MARTIN.

Mr. CALDWELL, of Tennessee, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4103) to correct the military record of Henry W. Martin; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment the joint resolution (H. R. No. 133) to prescribe the time for the payment of the tax on distilled spirits, and for other purposes.

The message further announced that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles; in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

A bill (S. No. 659) for the relief of Josiah H. Pillsbury; and

A bill (S. No. 901) to authorize the Secretary of War to relinquish certain portions of the United States military reservation of Fort Fetterman, Wyoming Territory.

INFECTIOUS DISEASES.

Mr. HARTRIDGE. On Friday last the House gave unanimous consent that on the next day, Saturday, after the morning hour, the Committee on Commerce should be authorized to report back the bill to prevent the introduction of infectious diseases into the United States, and that one hour should be devoted to the debate and consideration of the bill. The House adjourned over Saturday, so that that order could not be executed. I now ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Commerce be allowed one hour for the same purpose and under the same restrictions to-morrow after the morning hour.

Mr. HALE. The gentleman had better say after the reading of the Journal, for there may be no morning hour.

Mr. HARTRIDGE. Very well; I will do so.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the proposition of the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. HARTRIDGE.]

Mr. JONES, of Alabama. I have no objection, if there can be some understanding as to the time.

The SPEAKER. The time proposed is one hour, and the Chair presumes that that hour will be divided equally between the friends and the opponents of the bill.

There being no objection, it was so ordered.

LEGISLATIVE, ETC., APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. ATKINS, from the Committee on Appropriations, reported a bill (H. R. No. 4104) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1879, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. EDEN. I desire to reserve all points of order on the bill.

The SPEAKER. They will be reserved.

Mr. ATKINS. I do not think the gentleman will find anything in the bill subject to points of order. I move that the bill be printed, and referred to the Committee of the Whole; and I give notice that on Tuesday next I will ask for its consideration, and from day to day until disposed of, if the House will so consent.

The motion of Mr. ATKINS was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. EDEN. I now call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order being called for, the morning hour will begin at—

Mr. RIDDLE. I ask the gentleman to allow me to make a report from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, to which I think there will be no objection. If there is, I will ask that it be referred to the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. EDEN. I will not object to that.

PENSIONS.

Mr. RIDDLE, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, reported as a substitute for House bills No. 1990 and No. 2043 a bill (H. R. No. 4105) to amend an act entitled "An act to increase pensions in certain cases," approved June 18, 1874; which was read a first and second time.

The substitute provides for amending the act of June 18, 1874, so as to extend its provisions to all persons who are now or were at the time of the passage of said act entitled to pensions under existing laws, and who have lost an arm below the elbow or so near the elbow, or a leg below the knee or so near the knee, as to destroy the use of the elbow or knee joint, and such persons shall be rated in the second class and shall receive a pension of $24 per month.

Mr. RIDDLE. I ask that that bill be now considered.

Mr. EDEN. I do not object to the report being made at this time; but I understood that it was for reference to the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. RIDDLE. Then I will ask that the substitute be printed and referred to the Committee of the Whole on the public Calendar.

The motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. EDEN. I now insist upon the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order being called for, the morning hour will begin at twenty-three minutes before one o'clock.

Mr. SINGLETON. I have a report from the Committee on Printing, which I think is privileged at any time.

Mr. BANKS. That is privileged, and therefore should not come in during the morning hour.

The SPEAKER. It will be received as a privileged report prior to the beginning of the morning hour.

AGRICULTURAL REPORT FOR 1877.

Mr. SINGLETON, from the Committee on Printing, reported back, with an amendment, the following resolution:

Resolved by the House of Representatives, (the Senate concurring.) That there be printed 300,000 copies of the report of the Commissioner of Agriculture for 1877; 224,000 copies for the use of the House of Representatives, 56,000 copies for the use of the Senate, and 20,000 copies for the use of the Department of Agriculture.

The amendment was to add to the resolution the following:

Provided, however, That the number of pages of said report shall not exceed five hundred.

Mr. SINGLETON. I call the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the amendment was agreed to, and the resolution, as amended, was adopted.

Mr. SINGLETON moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

REPORT ON FORESTRY.

Mr. SINGLETON. I am further directed by the Committee on Printing to report back the resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk, with an amendment.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved by the House of Representatives, (the Senate concurring.) That there be printed 5,000 copies of the report upon forestry transmitted by the President to Congress from the Commissioner of Agriculture on the 13th day of December last, 3,000 copies thereof for the use of the House of Representatives, 1,500 for the use of the Senate, and 500 copies for the Commissioner of Agriculture.

The amendment was to add to the resolution the following:

Provided, however, That the total number of pages of said report shall not exceed 650.

Mr. AIKEN. Is not the resolution open to amendment?

The SPEAKER. It is.

Mr. AIKEN. I move, then, to amend it by striking out "five thousand" and inserting in lieu thereof "twenty-five thousand," and upon that amendment I propose to say a few words.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. I would ask whether debate is in order upon this question during the morning hour? If this resolution is likely to lead to debate I must insist upon the morning hour.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia is not entitled to the floor; the gentleman from South Carolina is on the floor.

Mr. EDEN. I call for the reading of the amendment.

The SPEAKER. The amendment is to strike out "five thousand" and insert in lieu thereof "twenty-five thousand."

Mr. GARFIELD. I understood that the regular order had been called for.

Mr. AIKEN. A resolution of this kind cannot pass without a word of explanation and protest.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will give the gentleman all his rights under the rule.

Mr. GARFIELD. Certainly, the Speaker had already announced that the morning hour had begun.

The SPEAKER. But the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. SINGLETON] antagonized that announcement.

Mr. AIKEN. Mr. Speaker, some explanation is necessary to acquaint the House with the subject before them that they may vote understandingly upon the report of the Committee on Printing.

In the spring of 1874, a memorial was presented to Congress from the "American Association for the Advancement of Science," asking for such legislation as would tend to encourage the cultivation of timber and the preservation of forests. That memorial was referred to the Committee on Public Lands, who, after maturely considering its merits, reported favorably and presented a bill authorizing the appointment by the President of the United States of a Commissioner of Forestry, who should make investigations upon this and all kindred subjects. This commissioner was subsequently appointed, and he is the agent of the Government who now presents to this body the result of his investigations in the shape of a Report upon Forestry, and of which report I ask the publication of 25,000 copies, instead of 5,000 as proposed by the Committee on Printing.

I am not here, sir, to defend this agent, for I never knew him until I met him before the Committee on Agriculture; but he is a man of national reputation and I presume has his reputation somewhat at stake in submitting this report. He has labored assiduously for two years to fulfill the order of Congress in making these investigations upon the subject of forestry, forest culture, and all other questions incidental thereto.

The printing of this report was maturely considered by the Committee on Agriculture, consisting of eleven members. The manuscript is sufficient to fill two volumes, one a volume of closely printed matter of perhaps six hundred and fifty pages, the other a volume of statistical matter, comprising about three hundred and fifty or four hundred pages. Your Committee on Agriculture believe it would be prudent, wise, and proper to publish the entire report, making perhaps a thousand or eleven hundred pages. But by a peculiar rule of this House, to which I am not now offering an objection, after the consideration of the subject by the committee of eleven members, we have the matter again submitted for the consideration of the Printing Committee, which is composed of but three members, who in their wisdom decide that the Committee on Agriculture were 95 per cent. wrong. To my mind, sir, this is a most remarkable conclusion.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I ask the chairman of the Committee on Printing if he has delved into this mass of manuscript matter? Has he a conception of the magnitude of this work, and of its importance to the people of this country? If he has I would ask why is it that his committee have suggested the printing of only 5,000 copies? Is it because printing a large number would not be "in the line of economy?" If this is the purport of his report, and it should be approved by this House, I shall on a proper occasion introduce a resolution, to be referred to an appropriate committee, asking for a definition of that oft-repeated cry, harped upon this floor so constantly, "it is not in the line of economy."

It will require but $5,000 to print 5,000 copies of this report, and instead of spending a larger amount for the benefit of the great agricultural interests of our country the Committee on Printing favor that economy which would almost smother the report and prevent a single copy from falling into the hands of the farmers. Sir, compare this species of economy with that which appropriates for a defunct Navy or for an inefficient Army more millions of the public money than we are asking for thousands. Yes, sir, we give more as an annual salary to a single commodore or general than is asked for to spread information among the people.

This is the first time during this session that the agricultural interests have asked that some benefit shall accrue to them from the appropriations made to develop the resources of the country.

Mr. FINLEY. Will the gentleman from South Carolina allow me to make a suggestion in the way of an inquiry?

Mr. AIKEN. Certainly.

Mr. FINLEY. The gentleman stated that it would cost $5,000 to print 5,000 copies of this report. Now, is it not true that it would only cost $15,000 to print 25,000 copies?

Mr. AIKEN. I can print 25,000 copies for $11,000.

Mr. Speaker, I undertook to rummage through this mass of manuscript to satisfy myself about its contents; and having learned its supposed contents by an examination of the captions to the various chapters, I ask the privilege of stating them to the House.

The first chapter contains an account of the distribution of forests throughout the United States, and their extent in the respective States and Territories.

The second chapter is captioned "The methods of preserving and increasing these forests;" the third speaks of the method of planting out forests, and describes the trees best adapted to different localities. Fourth, "Wood as a material for paper-making." Fifth, "The manufacture of charcoal and its uses, with wood-gas for illumination and other purposes." Sixth, "The consumption of wood by railroads, the respective consumption for fuel and for cross-ties." Seventh, "The comparative value of different kinds of wood for heating purposes." Eighth, "The resinous products of our forest, and the European method of preserving resinous trees."

Now, Mr. Speaker, it is a well-known fact that the resinous industries of the Southern States, in which so much money is annually invested, are being seriously injured by the suicidal policy adopted in this country of extracting as much turpentine from the trees as possible in the shortest practicable time. This gradual but certain destruction of this immense industry should be averted, and it can only be done by furnishing our citizens with the information contained in this chapter. If investigation has proven to the people of Europe how this industry can be continued for generations, and yet not exhaust the means of supply, it will be worth more than the cost of publishing this report to our citizens, if we by this means inform them of this method. And, sir, unless something be done to check the present system, this great industry, which at present seems exhaustless, must in a few years be confined to a very contracted area.

The next chapter treats of the tanning materials to be found in this country. Can anything be more important, Mr. Speaker? I imagine not. This industry, by the importation of raw hides without duty, has enabled the United States to export annually eight million dollars' worth of leather, and if it were known whence we could obtain the material to enable us to tan leather at a still less cost, our exports might be increased twofold to the advantage of that portion of our laboring population.

"The results of forest fires and their occurrence and prevention" is the caption of another chapter, and I would only ask, if there are not towns and villages in our Northwestern States that would have paid the cost of printing this report could they have been allowed within the past four years to circulate this chapter among their neighbors?

The next chapter speaks of the "insect ravages of forests, diseases, and other destroying agencies." What can be of more immediate interest to the agricultural communities of our country? Entire forest belts are sometimes swept out of existence by insects, and if in this chapter we are to be advised of a remedy, that alone will be worth the cost of publication.

Next comes the question of the "importance of forests to agriculture." A vital question; none more so. To-day the thoughtless farmer sells his forests with the hope and prospect of immediate gain, never for one moment believing that the great cause of agriculture is injured just to the extent that he assists in denuding the earth of the covering nature gave it. If, by reading this chapter, he can be restrained and induced to preserve and indeed increase his forest area, will we not be amply repaid for the appropriation? From almost every section of our country comes the wail that the climate has changed or some other cause exists that prevents our lands producing as they did years ago. Who can say that the destruction of our forests is not the cause of this mysterious change? Perhaps there are data enough in this chapter to satisfy the thoughtful agriculturist.

This is followed by a chapter or dissertation upon the manner in which the forests of Europe are managed. Are we too old to learn from these experienced scientists? Years ago the farmers of Europe were as reckless and thoughtless as are the farmers of America, and to-day they realize the folly of their recklessness. The annual freshets of the Po and other European rivers are national calamities. Their cause is directly described to be the destruction of the forests upon the adjacent hillsides. No one can tell how many millions of acres of fertile low lands have in this country been rendered hopelessly barren from the same cause. Torrents of rain-fall are annually washing from our denuded hillsides gulches of barren sand upon our irrevocably ruined bottom lands, while the soluble fertility is swept by the river's current into the ocean. Let us learn from those more experienced a lesson as to how to arrest this accelerated progress to destruction. If Europe has discovered that a preservation of her forests is a preservation of her soil let us become adepts in this school of learning. If the luxuriant leaves of our forest trees check the fall, and the myriad rootlets retard the flow of rain-water that frequently pours from our summers' clouds at the rate of an inch in depth to a minute of time, then let us cherish the trunks that bear those leaves and encourage the growth of those miniature rootlets.

Europe has her schools of forestry, and the next chapter in this report treats of that subject. Are we too learned to receive instruction from this source also? If this report tells us what Europe is doing, let us know the fact, and let our farmers learn what older nations are doing upon a subject of such vital importance to their vocation.

But the last chapter is perhaps the most important, and that treats of the influence of forests on climate. Mr. Speaker, who can tell us to-day what effect this denudation of our country has upon our climate? Why the sudden and unprecedented changes in our climate in almost every section of this broad land? Whence the cause of the periodic droughts annually experienced nowadays throughout our cotton belt? No one can say that denudation and consequent rapid evaporation is not the cause.

Mr. Speaker, these are the various topics treated of in the first volume of this report. The second volume is one of statistics, which we do not ask to have published, but which, I believe, should appear with the other as information for the people.

I have made a calculation of the cost of publishing 25,000 copies of this report provided it covers no more than 650 pages. It will not exceed $11,200.

Mr. SINGLETON. Did you get that from the Public Printer?

Mr. AIKEN. Yes; and I can state another fact for the benefit of this House, and I beg the members to hear and remember it. While 25,000 copies of this report, if published by the Government printing establishment here in Washington, where house rent, fuel, and gas are supplied at the expense of the Government, will cost $11,200, I can take the very same job to Philadelphia and have it done by private parties for $9,000. Fifty thousand copies of this work will cost but $21,000, and 100,000 copies would not cost as much as you pay to three or four officials of this Government in the shape of annual salaries, and it was for the printing of this last number that the Committee on Agriculture asked in their report. I submit, Mr. Speaker, that the report of the Committee on Printing, proposing to publish only 5,000 copies of this volume, which contains so much invaluable information upon the agricultural and manufacturing industries of our country is unreasonably economical, and I trust the House will adopt my amendment proposing to publish 25,000 copies.

Mr. SINGLETON. The Committee on Printing have no feeling about this matter. I desire to lay before the House what the Committee on Agriculture did. The gentleman has told but a part; I wish to tell the balance. The committee recommended to the House the publication of 100,000 copies of this report, embracing eleven hundred and fifty pages, three hundred and fifty pages of which the Committee on Printing propose to strike out because the gentleman who prepared the work states that it is not necessary they should be published, as they contain mostly matters which are embraced in other reports accessible to everybody. Now, it seems to me that to publish 100,000 copies of this work at the enormous expense of $100,000 would be in the present state of our finances an extravagant expenditure of money, and unless the House shall take the responsibility of publishing that number, or even 25,000, as proposed by the amendment of the gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. AIKEN,] it will not be done.

What did your Committee on Printing do? When the matter came before us we considered it in all kindness toward the gentleman who made the report from the Committee on Agriculture. We had Professor Hough, who prepared the work, before us, and, after a thorough examination, came to the conclusion that we ought to publish about 5,000 volumes and have the work stereotyped. If, after examination, the House should find it really so valuable, it will be a very easy matter to strike off any number that we may think the value of the work will justify. That is exactly what the Committee on Printing have done. We did not follow the recommendation of the Committee on Agriculture for the publication of 100,000 volumes, containing eleven hundred and fifty pages each, of which three hundred and fifty pages contain nothing but statistics as to the amount of lumber shipped from one country to another, &c. If the House thinks proper to print 25,000 copies of this work, it will be the act of the House, and not of the committee. We have just agreed to print 300,000 of the Agricultural Report, showing our interest in agriculture.

I now call the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; which was upon the amendment of Mr. AIKEN to strike out "5" and insert "25," so as to provide for printing 25,000 copies.

The amendment was agreed to, there being ayes 130, noes not counted.

Mr. AIKEN. I ask, by unanimous consent, that the resolution be further amended so as to harmonize with the amendment just adopted, and in accordance with the proportion of the resolution reported by the Committee on Printing I move to amend so it will provide 15,000 for the use of the House, 7,500 for the use of the Senate, and 2,500 for the use of the Agricultural Department.

There was no objection, and the amendment was agreed to.

The concurrent resolution, as amended, was then adopted.

Mr. SINGLETON moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

A message from the President, by Mr. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries, announced that the President had approved and signed bills of the following titles:

A bill (H. R. No. 305) granting a pension to Mrs. Rebecca C. Maxwell, widow of the late Colonel O. C. Maxwell, One hundred and ninety-fourth Ohio Volunteer Infantry;

A bill (H. R. No. 2584) granting a pension to Margaret R. Coloney, widow of the late Major Josiah B. Coloney, First Maryland Infantry Volunteers;

A bill (H. R. No. 2686) making appropriations for fortifications and for other works of defense, and for the armament thereof, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1879, and for other purposes;

A bill (H. R. No. 2887) to authorize the granting of an American register to a foreign-built ship for the purposes of the Woodruff scientific expedition around the world;

A bill (H. R. No. 3104) granting a pension to Kate Louise Roy, widow of J. P. Roy, late lieutenant-colonel United States Army; and

A bill (H. R. No. 3721) to remove the political disabilities of Robert H. Chilton.

MORNING HOUR.

The SPEAKER. The morning hour begins at one o'clock, and the call of committees for reports rests with the Committee on the Library.

LIBRARY OF CONGRESS.

Mr. COX, of New York, from the Committee on the Library, reported back a bill (S. No. 648) to constitute a commission to consider and report a plan for providing enlarged accommodations for the Library of Congress, with the recommendation that it do pass.

The bill was read.

The first section provides that the two chairmen of the Joint Committee on the Library of Congress on the part of the Senate and House, the chairman of the Senate Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, the chairman of the House Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, and the Librarian of Congress shall constitute a commission to consider the whole subject of providing enlarged accommodations for the Library of Congress, and to report a plan for such accommodations, together with an estimate of the cost.

The second section appropriates $2,500, or so much thereof as may be necessary, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for procuring such plans as the commission may prescribe in furtherance of the provisions of the act.

Mr. FORT. Mr. Speaker, does not that bill under the rule go to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union?

Mr. COX, of New York. I trust the gentleman from New York will let me make a short statement in reference to this matter before he insists on his point of order.

Mr. FORT. I withdraw the point of order temporarily so the gentleman from New York may be heard.

Mr. COX, of New York. I simply desire to state to this House, Mr. Speaker, that six times the Librarian of Congress has recommended some provision for the protection and preservation of our books. We ought either to abolish the Library or provide greater accommodation. The Library is growing, both as to books and readers. It has already 331,118 books, or had January 1, 1878; 110,000 pamphlets; making 441,118. Of these over 39,000 are law-books, not to mention maps, &c. There is shelf-room in the Library for only 260,000 volumes. Seventy thousand volumes have no place; they are choking up the Library, rendering it a place of destruction, not of preservation. The Library is suffocated. Something ought to be done in order to save the books already there.

There has been an increase the past year of 20,021 volumes and of maps, &c., 2,622:

Derived from these sources:	Books.	Pamphlets.
By purchase	7,682	849
By copyright	8,932	5,340
By deposit of the Smithsonian Institution	2,231	2,154
By donation, (including State documents)	1,030	390
By exchange	126	655
Total	20,021	9,348

Besides room is desired for the purposes referred to the Library by Congress, as to indexing of debates, documents, &c.

I hope the gentleman from Illinois, since our committees cannot agree on any plan or appropriate place for the building, will at least allow this simple appropriation to go through for the purpose of ascertaining what can be done to relieve the Library.

I could show to the House if I had the time just exactly what this Library has to do. We have given them a great deal to do. We add eight thousand volumes yearly by reason of our copyright law. We ought to provide for the annual increase of twenty thousand volumes or repeal the copyright law and stop buying books. We would have a large increase even if we should fail to appropriate money to buy new volumes. The Librarian has often asked for some enlarged accommodation for these books which are being ruined.

The Committee on the Library on June 8, 1876, through Mr. Senator HOWE, reported to the Senate a bill and a report, (No. 387, Forty-fourth Congress, first session.) From that report reasons may be gathered against any grudging upon so interesting a subject as this Congressional Library. I quote:

But in a strictly economic sense the necessity of larger accommodations for our Library is urged upon us. The Library already holds fifty thousand volumes (1876) which are stacked up upon its floors simply because they cannot be placed upon its shelves.

They do not serve the purpose for which they were designed, simply because they are inaccessible. They are scarcely more available stacked up within the Library room than if they were still in the book-stalls from which they were gathered. The evil is not limited merely to closing the books which are excluded from the shelves. They block the way to books which are upon the shelves. The whole work of the Library is embarrassed. The Library is being suffocated. The evil is constantly growing with every year's accumulations. That growth cannot be prevented even if we refuse further appropriations for the purchase of books. The copyright laws of themselves bring to the Library annually about eight thousand books, seven thousand periodicals, together with musical and dramatic compositions, photographs, engravings, chromos, maps, charts, drawings, and prints, which number in the aggregate about twenty-seven thousand. The accessions from the Smithsonian Institution add largely to this number every year. It is incredible that Congress should exclude from its use these rich accessions by refusing to provide space for their accommodation.

But these accumulations must be excluded or additional room must be supplied.

The Senate has never passed on the measure then reported. Here, therefore they have asked for an appropriation of $150,000. We propose no such an amount, and just now no amount at all; all we ask is that a commission shall be raised and plans sent in, in addition to other plans which have accumulated in the room of the Library Committee, for the purpose of seeing how this plethora of books can be accommodated. I trust the gentleman from Illinois will withdraw his point of order so the measure may be considered.

Mr. HALE. I understand the bill in no way commits the House to either of the plans or either of the places proposed, but leaves it all open, so that on the final report of this commission the two Houses may decide. Let me ask the gentleman whether it does commit the two Houses either to any plan or any place.

Mr. COX, of New York. It does not. The Joint Committee on the Library are committed to no particular plan and no particular place. All they ask is examination may be made by this commission composed of gentlemen who are responsible to their respective committees.

I will say to the gentleman from Illinois that I do not believe his point of order is well taken in reference to this bill. This is a Senate bill, and although the decision does not meet with my concurrence, nevertheless it has been held in this House that a point of order like that made by the gentleman from Illinois does not lie to a Senate appropriation bill.

Mr. FORT. I have no objection to the bill proposed by the gentleman from New York. I merely called attention to the point of order, because I believe all bills making appropriations of money should be sent to have their first consideration in Committee of the Whole. Out of consideration, however, for the gentleman from New York I will withdraw the point of order.

Mr. COX, of New York. I thank the gentleman. Before calling the previous question I will, with the permission of the House, insert the recommendation of the Librarian of Congress, so that when members read the RECORD in the morning they may be satisfied they have done exactly right in passing this bill. From the Librarian's report for 1867 I extract the following:

The Librarian renews, for the sixth time, his earnest appeal through this committee to the judgment and patriotism of Congress that this body will no longer permit the great collection of literature and art confided to its care to suffer injury and loss in its present narrow and inconvenient quarters. The space, which five years ago was too small for this Library, is now, through the accumulation of nearly one hundred thousand additional volumes, utterly inadequate, not only to store the books, pamphlets, maps, charts, engravings, and other works of art, but it is at times uncomfortably crowded by those persons laudably seeking to make the best use of its rich and overflowing stores. A new library building has become a positive and immediate necessity to furnish room for the readers, to say nothing whatever of room for the books, nearly seventy thousand volumes of which are now piled upon the floors in all directions. It is within the knowledge of the Librarian and has formed a frequent subject of painful regret that students, and especially ladies, are deterred from frequenting the Library of Congress, because of the difficulty of procuring seats therein, while some schools of the city, whose pupils once resorted to its halls to examine the sources of English literature in volumes not elsewhere to be found, can no longer enjoy the possibility of such improvement. It is, moreover, well known to all who come to the Library that its own rules, adopted by the committee for the protection of students, are subject to compulsory violation, and that the measure of silence which should be enforced for the protection of readers is rendered impossible for want of space in which members of Congress or other investigators can be isolated from the crowd of sight-seers which sometimes throng every public place within the Capitol. "The still air of quiet and delightful studies" which should mark the halls of every library becomes further and further removed from those of the Library of Congress with each advancing year. While it may be said in extenuation that it is no function of the Library of Congress to supply the public, whether residents of Washington or the scholars of the country, with facilities for information, it cannot be forgotten that Congress has itself invited such frequentation by the liberal policy of accumulating a great library at the seat of Government and throwing open its doors to all. It has also taken in charge the rich scientific library of the Smithsonian Institution as a probably permanent deposit, with the contingent responsibility of making its stores contribute to the diffusion of knowledge among men. And it would little comport with the theory or the practice of our popular institutions and form of government that any new bars should be placed in the path of the widest diffusion of intelligence. When it is considered that, from the nature of the case, the embarrassment of producing books and information from these accumulated heaps is constantly growing; that Congress, by the act of 1870 requiring two copies of every publication protected by copyright to be deposited in the Library of the Government, settled the question of its possible permanent shelter in the Capitol in the negative; that this building, overcrowded in all its departments, so that several committees have to occupy the same room, is crowded worst of all in the Library department, to which no possible outlet or addition of room can be procured; that the mere arithmetical computation of the growth of the country's literature proves that space must be provided for a building at least two-thirds the size of the Capitol within the century; that there is no large capital in Europe in which the library of the government can be or is provided for under the same roof with its legislature; that in our case, and in ours alone, there is added to the great Government Library the extensive and growing bureau of cop rights and copyright business for the whole country; that the attempt to get along with this double difficulty has already produced great injury to the books, with partial exclusion from their benefits, and must ultimately curtail the usefulness of the Library to an incalculable degree; that even if the remedy authorizing new space to be provided were immediately applied, some years must elapse before the requisite building accommodations could be completed: the case becomes one of such pressing emergency, not to say distress, that argument upon it should be unnecessary. Suffice it to say that it scarcely becomes a Government representing a nation of such wealth, intelligence, and power to treat the assembled stores of literature and art of the country, which its own laws have caused to be gathered at the capital and thrown open to the people, with such indignity as to subject them to injury and destruction or to equally reprehensible exclusion from their benefits. Of the mode and manner of providing for the care and permanent preservation of this treasury of knowledge Congress is properly the sole judge; but should another session of that body be suffered to pass without proper provision being in some way made for its protection, Congress will hardly be held to have discharged the trust reposed in it as the custodian of what President Jefferson called with prophetic wisdom the Library of the United States.

From all which, Mr. Speaker, it will appear that either our books have to go to waste or we must repeal the copyright and other laws devolving duties on the Library; or else that the very object of the Library must fail. It is with no pleasure that any one having pride in thought, or love for books, can see this splendid library go to ruin. It is not economy thus to allow our books to perish. A book has been called a reasonable creature. It bears "a life—a life beyond life—an immortality rather than a life." Let these precious lives be preserved!

I now call the previous question.

Mr. YOUNG. I desire to say a word, if the gentleman from New York will yield to me.

Mr. COX, of New York. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. YOUNG. I agree entirely with the gentleman from New York about the importance of this building and I am prepared to give my cordial sanction and indorsement to the bill, with this exception: we have a Supervising Architect of the Treasury and a whole corps of architects already in the Government service at a very considerable expense, and I suggest to the gentleman if it is necessary for an appropriation of $2,500 to be made simply to pay for plans that might be prepared by architects already in the service; it occurs to me that that item of expenditure might very properly be saved.

Mr. COX, of New York. In reply to the gentleman I will say that if it is found not necessary to expend that sum the gentlemen of the commission will not do it. I think they may well enough be trusted with the expenditure of $2,500.

Mr. YOUNG. I do not dispute that; but I do not see the necessity of this expenditure on public buildings when we have already a corps of architects in the public service drawing stated salaries who can do the work.

Mr. COX, of New York. The committee is already crowded with plans, and it has been thought that the best method of determining as to the plan is that proposed in the bill. I ask for the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the bill was ordered to be read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. COX, of New York, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

DUTIES ON IMPORTS.

Mr. WOOD, from the Committee of Ways and Means, reported a bill (H. R. No. 4106) to impose duties upon foreign imports, to promote trade and commerce, to reduce taxation, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. WOOD. I presume that under the rules this bill will necessarily go to the Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. The rules so require.

The bill was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. CONGER. I desire to reserve all points of order on the bill.

Mr. WOOD. I am directed by the committee to report the resolution which I send to the desk and on it I demand the previous question. It is the unanimous report of the committee.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the bill reported from the Committee of Ways and Means entitled "An act to impose duties upon foreign imports, to promote trade and commerce, to reduce taxation, and for other purposes" be made the special order for Thursday, April 4, after the morning hour, and to continue from day to day until disposed of.

Mr. O'NEILL. I move that the bill be laid on the table.

The SPEAKER. The bill is not before the House. It is in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. CONGER. I make the point of order that the resolution which has just been read is not in order as a report from the Committee of Ways and Means.

The SPEAKER. Why not?

Mr. CONGER. Because it is not a report of the committee on any business to be acted on by this House. It is not a report which can be made in the morning hour.

The SPEAKER. Reports from committees are undoubtedly in order.

Mr. CONGER. But this relates to the order of business in the House.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks it is a report nevertheless. It is for the House to determine.

Mr. CONGER. Is that report subject to amendment?

The SPEAKER. It is if the demand for the previous question is not sustained.

Mr. WOOD. I will state to the gentleman from Michigan there were no differences of opinion in committee on this question. I assume that it is the desire of this House to dispose of this bill by passing it as speedily as possible. Therefore we have desired to fix as early a day as practicable for its consideration, so as to give ample opportunity for discussion and that we may come to a final vote on the bill itself.

Mr. CONGER. I venture to say to that gentleman that I believe it is the opinion of the majority of the House that that bill should not even be considered.

Mr. WOOD. I am quite willing to test the sense of the House upon that question. Therefore I have demanded the previous question upon the adoption of the resolution.

Mr. CONGER. And I hope it will be voted down.

The SPEAKER. The Chair, in corroboration of his position, directs the reading of Rule 151.

The Clerk read as follows:

It shall be the duty of the Committee of Ways and Means to take into consideration all reports of the Treasury Department and such other propositions relative to raising revenue and providing ways and means for the support of the Government as shall be presented or shall come in question and be referred to them by the House, and to report their opinion thereon by bill or otherwise—

The SPEAKER. That is enough. The language of the rule is, "by bill or otherwise."

Mr. CONGER. Then I hope the previous question will be voted down. I still submit this changes the rules of the House, and therefore this is not a report which the committee is authorized to make. If the Chair considers it is, I will not press the point further.

The SPEAKER. The Committee of Ways and Means, under the rule just read, have a right to report by bill or otherwise. The Chair has never known it to be successfully questioned as to bills of this character. In fact in 1872 the then occupant of this chair [Mr. BLAINE] decided that the committee had that right even though the bill came in for committal only under another rule.

Mr. CONGER. Suppose the committee reported a motion to suspend the rules. Does the Chair hold that they would have the right to do that?

The SPEAKER. This is not a proposition to suspend any rule.

Mr. CONGER. But it changes the order of business.

The SPEAKER. It is the constant practice of the House to limit debate and to instruct the Committee of the Whole as to what shall be done with a bill in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. BUTLER. Will the Chair allow me to make a single suggestion?

The SPEAKER. Certainly.

Mr. BUTLER. The Committee of Ways and Means have a right to report their opinions on matters of revenue by bill or otherwise; but they have not a right to report their opinions, I submit, on questions of order or on questions of how the business of the House shall be conducted, by bill or otherwise. The rule provides that they may report their opinions upon financial and revenue measures.

The SPEAKER. There is nothing in the rules that prohibits it, and the practice has been to allow it as to this class of legislation. In 1872, when Mr. DAWES was chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, a tariff bill was reported from that committee, not as now under the regular call of the committees in the morning hour, but outside of the morning hour, under the provisions of the rule that allowed them to report at any time for committal, and was made a special order in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. SAMPSON. Does this resolution propose to make the bill a special order?

Mr. WOOD. It proposes to make it a special order.

The SPEAKER. The resolution will again be read.

The resolution was again read.

Mr. CONGER. That is a motion.

The SPEAKER. Well, if it be a motion it is in order; but it is a report from a committee, which gives it more force.

Mr. CONGER. Then I hope the previous question will be voted down.

Mr. JONES, of Ohio. Would an amendment in the nature of a substitute be now in order?

The SPEAKER. Not unless the previous question be voted down. Mr. BURCHARD. This resolution simply fixes a time for the consideration of the bill, and if it is not passed the bill will stand upon the Calendar, and when the House goes into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union it cannot be reached until all the bills preceding it upon the Calendar have been disposed of or laid aside.

Mr. CONGER. We all understand that.

Mr. BURCHARD. This is a resolution fixing a time for the special consideration of the bill, so that we may have an early opportunity to consider it in committee, and then any member may move to strike out the enacting clause and bring the House to a vote upon it.

Mr. O'NEILL. But suppose members do not want to waste the time of the House by considering it at all?

Mr. BURCHARD. The bill will stand upon the Calendar of the Committee of the Whole, even though this resolution be not adopted. [Loud cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

The question was put upon seconding the call for the previous question; and on a division there were—ayes 126, noes 99.

Mr. CONGER. I call for tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. CONGER and Mr. WOOD were appointed.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 123, noes 107.

So the previous question was seconded.

The main question was then ordered, being upon the adoption of the resolution.

Mr. CONGER. I call for the yeas and nays upon the adoption of the resolution.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. BUTLER. I rise to make a parliamentary inquiry. Will the effect of this order be to exclude all other business, including the appropriation bills?

Mr. WOOD. I will state to the gentleman from Massachusetts that there is no antagonism between the two committees as to this measure.

Mr. CONGER. I object to debate.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts asked a question, and the Chair permitted the gentleman from New York to answer it.

Mr. CONGER. I believe the previous question is prevailing?

The SPEAKER. It is.

Mr. CONGER. Then I object to any debate.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 137, nays 114, not voting 40; as follows:

Mr. MAISH. I am paired with Mr. MCKENZIE, of Kentucky, who has been called home by sickness in his family. If he were present, he would vote "ay" and I would vote "no."

Mr. SOUTHARD. My colleague, Mr. VAN VORHES, is paired with Mr. WILSON, of West Virginia.

Mr. BEEBE. I am paired generally with my colleague, Judge LAPHAM. I do not know how he would vote if he were here; but I do not feel at liberty to vote in his absence.

Mr. FULLER. I am paired with my colleague, Mr. SEXTON. If present, he would vote "no" and I would vote "ay."

Mr. AIKEN. My colleague, Mr. EVINS, is absent. If present, he would vote "ay."

Mr. BAKER, of Indiana. On political questions I am paired with Mr. SPARKS, of Illinois. As this seems to be treated as a political question I desire to withdraw my vote. I will state that if Mr. SPARKS were present I presume he would vote "ay;" I would vote "no."

Mr. O'NEILL. My colleague, Mr. FREEMAN, is paired with Mr. YEATES, of North Carolina. If they were present, Mr. FREEMAN would vote "no" and Mr. YEATES would vote "ay."

Mr. BOYD. On all political questions I am paired with my colleague, Mr. KNAPP. This seems to be viewed as a political question, and I desire therefore to withdraw my vote. If Mr. KNAPP were present, he would vote "ay" and I would vote "no."

Mr. PATTERSON, of Colorado. I am paired on this question with Mr. ERRETT, of Pennsylvania. If present, he would vote "no" and I would vote "ay."

Mr. FRANKLIN. On this question I am paired with the gentleman from New York, Mr. DWIGHT. If present, Mr. DWIGHT would vote "no" and I would vote "ay."

Mr. CONGER. Before the Chair announces the result of the vote, I desire to raise a point of order upon it.

The SPEAKER. The Chair should announce the result before any point of order can well be taken upon it.

The result of the vote was then announced as above stated, and that the resolution was adopted.

Mr. CONGER. I now desire to raise this point of order: that the resolution just voted upon proposes to make a special order of the business of the House, and therefore it requires a two-thirds vote for its adoption. I would call the attention of the Chair to page 315 of the Manual, which says:

Special orders are made under a suspension of the rules.—Journal, 1, 31, p. 1176. [And of course, (unless unanimous consent is given for the purpose—Journal, 1, 30, p. 580,) can only be made, except in the case of appropriation bills, when a motion to suspend the rules is in order. Most of the "special orders" of late years have been made by unanimous consent, and it is of rare occurrence that a special order is made by a suspension of the rules requiring a two-thirds vote.]

The House may at any time, by a vote of a majority of the members present, make any of the general appropriation bill a special order—Rule 119, p. 129; but in all other cases it requires a two-thirds vote to make a special order, it being a change of the established order of business.

Mr. WOOD. That point of order was made before the resolution was voted upon, and the Chair decided it.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to hear the point of order.

Mr. CONGER. This point of order has not been made before.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan, [Mr. CONGER,] the Chair thinks, is mixing the rule with a decision of a former occupant of the Chair. The Chair would suggest that if the gentleman would read Rule 119 he will find that it does not contain the words he has quoted; yet from his reading of them the House might gather the impression that they constituted a part of the rule.

Mr. SPRINGER. Has the morning hour expired?

Mr. WOOD. I desire to have referred to the Committee on Printing a resolution to print extra copies of the tariff bill.

Mr. CONGER. Rule 119—

Mr. WOOD. If the gentleman—

Mr. CONGER. If the gentleman from New York [Mr. WOOD] will insist upon interrupting, I will call for the regular order, as the morning hour has expired.

The SPEAKER. The previous question is still operating.

Mr. CONGER. So I supposed. Rule 119 says:

General appropriation bills shall be in order in preference to any other bills of a public nature unless otherwise ordered by a majority of the House.

And the House may, at any time, by a vote of a majority of the members present, make any of the general appropriation bills a special order.

Now, I suppose that it is not claimed that this bill reported from the Committee of Ways and Means is a "general" appropriation bill. I will now read what I proposed to read from the rule.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman appears to be coupling a decision with the rule.

Mr. CONGER. I have read the rule, which I suppose does not apply to the case of a report from the Committee of Ways and Means, but only to appropriation bills and those "general appropriation bills." The decision which I have read, and which I suppose is at least good by way of argument, is:

The House may at any time, by a vote of a majority of the members present, make any of the appropriation bills a special order; but in all other cases it requires a two-third vote to make a special order, it being a change of the established order of business.

I made that point of order, the Chair will remember, when the resolution was reported. I now make the point of order, the resolution having been voted upon, that it requires a two-third vote to adopt it. I read further from the Manual:

The usual form of resolution for making a special order is, "that the (here describe the bill or whatever else it may be) be made the special order for the — day of —, and from day to day until the same is disposed of."

I cannot find in the decisions of the Chair (I presume the Chair has the journal to which reference is made) anything which indicates that a report from the Committee of Ways and Means of a bill which is not in any sense of the term an appropriation bill, and especially is not a "general appropriation bill," may be made a special order by a majority vote. I therefore make the point of order which I have indicated.

The SPEAKER. The point of order raised by the gentleman from Michigan, [Mr. CONGER,] as the Chair understands it, is that it requires a two-third vote to pass the resolution which has just been reported from committee and adopted. That is the common-sense mode of approaching the question.

Mr. CONGER. Yes, sir.

The SPEAKER. The very rule to which the gentleman refers does not contain any directory words in the direction he desires, and the gentleman relies upon a decision which was made by Speaker Stevenson, in the first session of the Twenty-third Congress, upon the motion to make the bill (H. R. No. 443) regulating the deposit of the money of the United States in certain local banks a special order in the House at a certain hour, and which, as will be seen, applied to a direction in the House as to what should be done by the House. This resolution, in addition to being a report from a committee and subject to the action of a majority of the House in this respect, is in the nature of an instruction to the Committee of the Whole how to proceed; and clearly a majority of the House has that matter within its control. The Chair will cause to be read his own decision on this point when heretofore raised.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. BANKS made the point of order that the last clause of the resolution, namely, "to send for persons and papers," changed the rules of the House, and was not now in order.

The Speaker overruled the point of order on the ground that on the motion to commit or refer it was in the power of the House to commit or refer with instructions, and that conferring that power upon a committee was merely directing its mode of procedure.—House Journal, second session Forty-fourth Congress, page 297.

The SPEAKER. This decision was appealed from; and the House sustained the decision—yeas 146, nays 78. The Chair desires further to read from the Manual:

A motion to commit may be amended by the addition of instructions. (Page 186.)

But the Chair would refer to a case precisely in point, when a similar bill to this, a tariff bill, was submitted under report for commitment in 1872. The Chair will cause to be read the proceedings which then occurred and the decision of the then Speaker thereon.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. DAWES, from the Committee of Ways and Means, reported a bill (H. R. No. 2323) to reduce duties on imports and internal taxes, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. DAWES. I move, Mr. Speaker, that this bill be printed, and that it be committed to the Committee of the Whole, and made a special order for Tuesday next after the morning hour, and from day to day thereafter until disposed of, to the exclusion of all other business.

The SPEAKER. There can be no conflict with the Committee on Appropriations. A special order in Committee of the Whole does of itself take precedence of all subsequent orders. The Chair is under the impression, although he has not consulted the Calendar, that only two special orders in Committee of the Whole are now pending, the West Point appropriation bill and the fortification appropriation bill, which will probably take a very short time. These will necessarily take precedence, and then the bill reported by the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means will be considered, to the exclusion of other business.

This is an assignment which the rules entitle the Committee of Ways and Means to have. It is merely having a bill reported from that committee referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union; and it may by a majority vote be made a special order.

Mr. WOOD. There was a minority report in that case from the same committee.

The SPEAKER. This ruling of the Chair was not appealed from; it was accepted as a correct construction of the rule. The present ruling of the Chair is in accord with the decision in that case, and it seems to be also in accord with the plain, practical, common-sense principle that the House, having referred a bill to the Committee of the Whole, has the right to instruct that committee as to its procedure.

Mr. BANKS. Mr. Speaker, I desire to say a word on this question of order. I did not vote upon the question before the House because elsewhere I did not dissent from the resolution, although I am not altogether in favor of it. But inasmuch as the ruling upon this question is likely to be a precedent in this House hereafter, I desire to say that the resolution reported from the Committee of Ways and Means changes the order of business to such an important extent that if closely adhered to it would exclude every appropriation bill from consideration until this bill shall be disposed of. The order of business in this House cannot be changed except by a suspension of the rules, which requires a two-third vote in every case except one; that is, any of the general appropriation bills may at any time be made a special order by a majority vote.

Mr. GARFIELD. The gentleman will, of course, remember one other exception—that we can, by a majority vote, suspend the rules to go to business on the Speaker's table.

The SPEAKER. In answer to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BANKS] the Chair will say—

Mr. BANKS. I had not finished.

Mr. SAYLER. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him one question?

Mr. BANKS. In one moment. The proceedings read (from the GLOBE, I presume) do not meet this case at all. There is no decision of the Speaker there; he makes an argument that the pending proposition would not interfere seriously with the business of the House. But my point is that the order of business in this House can only be changed by a two-third vote, except in those cases where the power to suspend the rules is expressly given to a majority; and there is no such power given as to reports from the Committee of Ways and Means.

The SPEAKER. If the language of the Speaker in 1872 is not a ruling, the Chair is at a loss to understand the meaning of language. The Speaker said then:

This is an assignment which the rules entitle the Committee of Ways and Means to have. It is merely having a bill reported from that committee referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and it may by a majority vote be made a special order. But of course the special order does not supersede unless the House goes into committee.

The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BANKS] himself took part in that discussion; and no point of order was raised by any one in the House upon that affirmation of the Speaker. It is clearly correct that the House has the right by a majority to refuse to go into Committee of the Whole, or, having gone into committee, may refuse to proceed to the consideration of a particular bill and take up matters as the committee may see fit, by passing over the bills in regular order on the Calendar.

Mr. WOOD moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution reported from the Committee of Ways and Means was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. WOOD moved that 5,000 extra copies of the bill just reported be printed; which motion was referred, under the law, to the Committee on Printing.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. SPRINGER. I rise to call up a question of privilege—the report of the Committee of Elections in the case of Dean vs. Field, from the third congressional district of Massachusetts.

Mr. CONGER. Mr. Speaker, I understand that the friends of the contestee in this case are not prepared to go on to-day, or at least would prefer to have the case postponed until to-morrow. I ask the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] to let the District of Columbia bill, which is a special order, be considered to-day, this case going over till another day.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan, [Mr. CONGER,] the Chair presumes, raises the question of consideration. The Chair is bound to recognize the gentleman from Illinois to call up this case, as it is the highest question of privilege known to the rules after the election of a Speaker.

Mr. SPRINGER. I dislike to discommode any gentleman, but this case has been postponed some two weeks or ten days for the purpose of accommodating members on both sides of the House, and I cannot yield to further requests.

Mr. HENDEE. I raise the question of consideration on the ground that the House having assigned an early day for the consideration of the tariff bill, the probability is the District of Columbia bill may not be passed unless it is pressed at every possible moment, and I raise the question of consideration so the House may determine as between the election case and the consideration of the District of Columbia bill.

Mr. SPRINGER. So far as the question of consideration is concerned, as I understand the rules, the question of consideration cannot be raised on a matter of this kind, this being of the highest privilege. It is in order unless the House postpones it or lays it aside for the present.

The SPEAKER. The question of consideration can be raised. The Chair is bound to recognize the gentleman from Illinois, because he rises to move to proceed to the consideration of business of the highest privilege, but the majority of the House may lay it aside, preferring that the unfinished business proceed first.

Mr. SPRINGER. Of course the House may vote not to take it up.

The SPEAKER. The vote may as well be taken on the motion of the gentleman from Illinois as in any other way. Those who do not desire to proceed with the consideration of the contested-election case can vote against the motion to take it up for present consideration.

Mr. CONGER. It has been so often agreed to on the one and the other side of the House to postpone a case of this sort in order to suit the convenience of the opposite side that it seems to me a suggestion merely on the part of the sitting member's friends that they were not prepared to go on with the case to-day would be sufficient to postpone its consideration.

Mr. SPRINGER. I have yielded so often to the postponement of this case that I am obliged to insist on my motion to proceed with its consideration at the present time.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 110, noes 105.

Mr. CALKINS demanded tellers.

Tellers were not ordered.

So the House determined to proceed with the further consideration of the contested-election case.

MASSACHUSETTS CONTESTED-ELECTION CASE.

The SPEAKER. The House now resumes the consideration of the following resolutions reported from the Committee of Elections.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That Walbridge A. Field is not entitled to a seat in this House as the Representative from the third congressional district of the State of Massachusetts.
Resolved, That Benjamin Dean is entitled to a seat in this House as the Representative from the third congressional district of the State of Massachusetts.

Mr. LUTTRELL. I hope the gentleman from Illinois will state at what time he proposes to call for a vote on this question.

Mr. SPRINGER. I cannot answer at this time, but at the earliest practical moment I shall demand the previous question, and hope it will be this afternoon some time.

Mr. LUTTRELL. Does the gentleman propose to take a vote to-day?

Mr. SPRINGER. I do, if it is possible; but the previous question will be called to-day at least.

Mr. GARFIELD. I wish the gentleman from Illinois would state what is the prospect of a vote being had to-day.

Mr. SPRINGER. It will not be earlier than five o'clock the previous question will be called.

Mr. GARFIELD. I suppose the Chair has a list of those who desire to speak on the question, and from that it can be judged whether we will reach a vote to-day or not.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has not been furnished with the list, or it is mislaid.

Mr. SPRINGER. The previous question will not be moved earlier than five o'clock.

Mr. GARFIELD. I hope it will be agreed the previous question will be considered as pending at the end of the day's session and that the vote shall not be taken to-day, but some time to-morrow. If we are going to wait until five o'clock before calling the previous question, we cannot get a vote to-day.

Mr. SPRINGER. I accept the proposition of the gentleman from Ohio, that the previous question will be called immediately after the reading of the Journal to-morrow.

Mr. FRYE. I hope that will not be done.

Mr. SPRINGER. I will say, then, after the morning hour.

Mr. KILLINGER. That time has already been set for the consideration of another bill.

Mr. SPRINGER. Then let it be understood that immediately after the morning hour to-morrow the previous question will be moved.

The SPEAKER. The House has given unanimous consent for the consideration to-morrow, after the reading of the Journal, of the bill to be reported from the Committee on Commerce in reference to contagious diseases. If the previous question is demanded and sustained to-night this will go over and come up immediately after the reading of the Journal to-morrow as the unfinished business, under operation of the previous question.

Mr. FRYE. I hope the gentleman will not insist on the previous question being demanded to-day. There is a gentleman relied on to make a speech who is now absent on account of sickness and will be absent throughout the day.

Mr. SPRINGER. I desire to accommodate any gentleman in that condition, and therefore give notice I will not call the previous question until to-morrow.

Mr. CONGER. After the morning hour?

Mr. SPRINGER. No, sir; but we begin to-morrow after the reading of the Journal with this as the unfinished business.

Mr. KILLINGER. That time has already been fixed for another question.

Mr. SPRINGER. In order that there may be no misunderstanding, I will state it is not the intention to call for a vote on this question to-day, but that to-morrow it will be called up immediately after the reading of the Journal as the unfinished business.

Mr. CONGER. After the morning hour?

Mr. SPRINGER. No, sir; after the reading of the Journal. There will be at least an hour's discussion to-morrow owing to the fact there will be an hour after the main question is ordered, and members will have ample time to reach the House before the vote is taken.

The SPEAKER. There has been, by unanimous consent of the House, authority given to the Committee on Commerce to report to-morrow morning a bill relating to the introduction of contagious diseases.

Mr. SPRINGER. Immediately after the morning hour.

The SPEAKER. Immediately after the reading of the Journal.

Mr. SPRINGER. I did not so understand. I will ask the Clerk to refer to the Journal to see if the order is not immediately after the morning hour.

The SPEAKER. The Chair recollects it quite distinctly that the order was immediately after the reading of the Journal.

Mr. SPRINGER. That will only take one hour. I will then call up the election case immediately afterward.

Mr. CONGER. I suggest that the gentleman call it up after the morning hour. Let us have a morning hour.

Mr. SPRINGER. There will be a morning hour after the election case is disposed of.

Mr. MILLS. There are two claimants for the seat of Representative from the third congressional district of Massachusetts. Each of them claims the seat by virtue of the judgment of a tribunal created by law. This is all the testimony we have to determine our judgment. There is no question about fraud. There is no question about ineligibility of electors; and the right to the seat must be determined alone by the consideration that we may give to the judgment of one or the other of these two tribunals. One of them is created by State authority alone. The other one is created by the joint action of the Federal and State governments. These two tribunals cannot both be supreme. One must speak by authority and the other without authority. Their judgments must carry weight or not in proportion as they speak by the authority of law.

Now, it is a familiar principle with all lawyers that a court having jurisdiction of a subject and the jurisdiction having attached, its judgment imports absolute verity, it speaks by inspiration, it cannot be called in question. It is another principle that where a court is without jurisdiction or its jurisdiction has not attached, its record imports absolute nullity. Now, if one of the courts speaks by authority of law and the other without, we must look to that tribunal that speaks with authority of law and whose judgment carries with it unquestioned verity.

As this is a Federal office we must look to that law that proclaims itself to be the supreme law of the land, "anything in the constitution or law of any State to the contrary notwithstanding." The Constitution of the United States is the highest law. What has it to say upon the subject of this election? Let us see. It says that the States may prescribe the times, manner, and places of holding elections for Representatives; but that Congress shall have the right by law to make or alter such regulations. The State has a primary right to regulate the elections of these Federal officers; but the Congress of the United States have the supreme supervising power over that. What for? For the preservation of the Federal House of Representatives. The States may be allowed, if their conduct be not inimical to the Federal Government, to go on with these regulations; but the Federal Government may at any time it pleases encroach upon the State regulations and make its own prescriptions either by abolishing the whole State regulations or by altering so much of it as it pleases.

Accordingly we see from the commencement of our Government that the Federal authority has encroached upon the State authority in various ways. Formerly some of the States elected by general ticket, others elected by districts; and that was a State regulation prescribed by the State authority. But how is it now? The Congress of the United States have prescribed that all the States shall elect by district. There is an interference with the "manner." Just in proportion as the Congress have advanced upon the State authority the State authority is superseded. Formerly it was the case that some of the States voted viva voce, others by ballot. But how is it now? The Congress of the United States, in obedience to that provision of the Constitution, requires that every State shall vote by printed or written ballot. What is the result? The State authority to that extent is superseded. And I might go on and enumerate other provisions of the State regulations that have been superseded by the Federal Government. In these cases will any one say that an election held by general ticket was legal? Will any one say that an election held viva voce is legal when the law of Congress, the paramount law, has "altered" the State regulation? Formerly the States prescribed different times, but now Congress prescribes a uniform time of holding elections. Will any one say that an election held under State law at a time different from that fixed by Congress is legal?

And now the Federal Government has prescribed, as a supervisory power over the State government, that a Federal representative shall be present at each polling-precinct to take care of the election, to guard the ballot-box, to superintend and supervise the count. For what? A Federal law of Congress says "to the end that each candidate for Congress shall receive every vote that has been cast for him." And the Federal Government says that he shall remain until the votes are deposited, watch the ballot-box, remain with it, demand the right to be present with it, by the authority of the Federal Government, until every vote is counted and the canvass is "wholly completed." Congress requires the circuit court of the United States to open before the election and remain open till after the election, that its jurisdiction may be exerted to guard the election of a Federal Representative. It requires the judge to appoint two supervisors for each voting-precinct, to be of different parties, if applied for. It authorizes and requires the supervisors to attend at all times and places fixed for registration, to challenge persons offering to register, to make return to the chief supervisor of the list of registered voters, to "inspect and scrutinize" the registry, to "detect and expose" the improper removal or addition of a name; to attend at all "times and places" fixed for holding elections and for counting the votes; to remain where the ballot-boxes are kept at all times. At the closing of the polls they are required to place themselves in such position as to enable them to engage in the work of canvassing the ballots, and remain "till every duty in respect to the canvass, certificates, returns, and statements have been wholly completed;" they are to remain in the presence of the officers holding the election and "to witness all their proceedings including the counting of the votes and the making of a return thereof." For what purpose are these regulations prescribed, altering as they do the former "manner" of conducting elections? Congress answers the question, "to the end that each candidate for Congress shall have every vote cast for him." Are these regulations necessary to secure that result?

Congress thought so. Congress prescribed them to guard the election of Representatives, because it was thought the State authority was either not able or not willing to protect the elective franchise and see a full and fair election.

What do all these carefully prescribed regulations mean? They mean something or nothing. If the State authority of Massachusetts can nullify them they mean nothing. But if they have any meaning at all it is that this power is exerted for the purpose of protecting the ballot and determining a fair and free election. It says so in terms. It commences back with the registration. It requires the supervisor to be present at the registration to challenge illegal names, to see that no legal names are stricken from the list. It authorizes and requires them to be present at the election.

For what purpose? What does the law say? To detect and expose, to guard and supervise. That is the language of the law. And it keeps them in the presence of the ballot-box till the election is closed, the result declared, and the whole canvass "wholly completed." It is the judgment, therefore, of a court created partly by State law and partly by Federal law. The State law appoints certain officers in the several wards: clerks, judges, and others. If afterward the State authority of Massachusetts can intervene, can nullify the whole Federal authority, can trample it under foot, it can render nugatory all these regulations made by Congress to secure a free and fair election. If the State can do this Congress is manifestly, without the power to make these regulations and without the power to preserve itself. If the State can disregard its supervisors it can disregard the day of election fixed by Congress, it can disregard the manner of voting by ballot as fixed by Congress, and the power so carefully retained in the Federal Constitution to supervise the State regulations for the protection and preservation of the House of Representatives is utterly nugatory and idle.

This is no new doctrine; this is the doctrine of Judge Story in his Commentaries on the Constitution. In commenting upon this article of the Constitution he says:

A discretionary power over elections must be vested somewhere. There seemed but three ways in which it would be reasonably organized. It might be lodged either wholly in the National Legislature, or wholly in the State Legislatures, or primarily in the latter and ultimately in the former. The last was the mode adopted by the convention.

Not only to invest the State governments primarily with the guarding of elections of members of Congress, but ultimately to place the power in Congress whenever it sees proper to take charge of elections of Federal Representatives; just to that extent the Federal Government intervenes and encroaches upon the State authority, inhibits the State authorities, and for the manifest reason, as Judge Story says, for the protection and preservation of itself.

Gentlemen have asked during this debate this question: suppose the supervisors do not attend; suppose they are appointed, and an election is held without their aid, as is the case in many districts throughout the country, does that necessarily nullify the election and render it void? Most unquestionably not. Certainly not. It is a privilege, and a privilege may be waived by the parties for whose benefit it is created; but when the privilege is asserted, and you deny to these parties who assert it their rights, every act is null and void. Take the elective franchise; every man is a unit in the sovereignty of the country and has a right to express his views at the ballot-box. But suppose two-thirds of the electors of a district remain away from the polls of their own volition, is the election void? Unquestionably not, because they did not see proper to exercise that privilege.

But suppose that all the electors come to the polls and two-thirds of them are forbidden to cast their ballots. Will you say that the election was legal? Unquestionably not? The privilege is conferred upon the citizen to vote, and it rests with him to assert that privilege or not to assert it. But when he claims it and is not allowed to exercise it, then the election is illegal. This principle of guarding great privileges runs all through the Constitution and our system of government. A man has a privilege accorded him to protect him against being tried twice for the same offense. That is a privilege. Suppose he is indicted the second time for an offense for which he has already been tried and he does not come into court and plead his former acquittal and protect himself by producing the record of that acquittal: will any one say that the judgment of the court condemning him a second time is illegal? Unquestionably not. But if he does come and present the record of his former trial and acquittal and presents the record of the court that tried him, and the court still proceeds to try him and convicts him, will any one say that the judgment of that court is not without authority?

Take another case. A citizen of New York is sued by a citizen of Pennsylvania in a State court. Suppose he comes into court and does not plead to the jurisdiction, will anybody say that the judgment of the court is void? Unquestionably not. But suppose he does come into court and plead to the jurisdiction and demand that the case be carried to a Federal court, and is overruled and judgment pronounced, who will say that the judgment of the court is according to law? These are privileges, and privileges conferred on the citizen when asserted in the manner provided by law; but if not recognized and judgment is rendered against them, to that extent the privileges are denied and the judgment is absolutely null and void.

Such are the facts in the case now before us. The Federal law provides by statute, in the language of Judge Story, for the appointment of Federal supervisors. Judge Story says there is a supervising authority in Congress, and the Congress of the United States in passing this law called them supervisors. Both seem to have understood the authority of Congress alike. Then to the extent the Federal authority advances upon the State authority it obliterates the State authority and the Federal Government may, as Judge Story says, take jurisdiction of the whole matter and regulate the election in every district as to time, place, and manner of holding elections.

It may take from the States the whole control of the elections of Representatives in Congress. So far Congress has gone as far as to appoint supervisors to assert the presence and supremacy of the Federal Government at the polls in the election of Federal Representatives.

Now it is the determination of that tribunal, partly State and partly Federal, which determines the question with authority of law and whose record imports absolute verity, that the judgment of the State tribunal which attempts to nullify the Federal authority and take from it the power to regulate the time, place, and manner of holding elections for Representatives is without authority of law and null and void, and its judgment imports absolute nullity. By the determination of the State tribunal Mr. Field is elected by 5 votes, but its judgment being without authority of law and in violation of the paramount law, its judgment is meaningless and constitutes no evidence of claim whatever.

By the determination of the joint tribunal, Mr. Dean is elected by 7 votes. This being the tribunal created by paramount law, and having proceeded in obedience to law, its judgment is the highest evidence of title. To seat Mr. Dean is to declare that Congress has the right to prescribe such regulations as its wisdom may suggest to protect the election of its Representatives, and that such regulations must be respected and obeyed, "anything in the constitution or laws of any State to the contrary notwithstanding." To seat Mr. Field is to declare that the regulations of the elections of Representatives by Congress is inferior and subordinate to the regulations of the State, and the States have the rightful power to nullify the Federal regulations and wholly disregard them. I am a State-rights democrat, but not of the nullification school.

Mr. EDEN. Mr. Speaker, Mr. Dean, the contestant in this case, claims the seat by virtue of the returns of the ward officers holding the election in the several wards composing the congressional district, the correctness of which returns is also shown by the certificates of the United States supervisors of election. These returns give Mr. Dean a majority over all of 4 votes. Mr. Field, the sitting member, claims the seat by virtue of a recount of the ballots made by three aldermen, acting as a committee for the board of aldermen for the city of Boston. The recount gives Field a plurality of 5 over Dean, but, counting the scattering votes, he has 4 votes less than a majority of the whole vote cast.

These ward officers are, for each ward, three inspectors of election, appointed by the mayor with the approval of the board of aldermen, and one warden, one clerk, and three inspectors of election, chosen by the qualified voters of the several wards, and whose duty it is to hold the elections, canvass the votes, and certify the returns to the city clerk. It is made the duty of the mayor and aldermen and city clerk—

To examine the returns made by the returning officers of each ward in the city, and if any error appears they shall forthwith notify said ward officers thereof and require of them new and additional returns, which, together with the original returns, shall be included in their return of the result of the election.

It will be observed that the mayor and aldermen have nothing to do with counting the ballots. In fact the ballots are not before them. If upon examination they find an error in the returns, they are not to correct it, but must summon the ward officers to make the correction. Their sole duty is to examine the returns, if any error is discovered to cause it to be corrected, and to certify to the secretary of state a copy of the record of the returns attested by the clerk of the city. The returns of the ward officers, so corrected and certified to the secretary of state, are the only evidence upon which the governor and council can act in giving the certificate of election.

Now, sir, I will state a remarkable fact in this case. The election was held by the proper officers and every requirement of the law was observed; the ballots were not only counted by the proper ward officers, but by the supervisors of election appointed by the United States circuit court, and the returns were certified in accordance with all the forms of law. Mr. Dean had a clear majority of 4 votes over all. No one has ever alleged that the officers of the election were guilty of any fraud. No one has ever pointed out an error in their returns. There has been no attempt to show that a single ballot was put in any box with the name of Mr. Field on it that was not counted and credited to him. It has not been charged that the officers of election counted a vote for Mr. Dean that was not given him by a legal voter.

It is a conceded fact that the returns made by the ward officers to the city clerk give truly the result of their count of the votes.

In order to retain his seat, Mr. Field must set aside the result of the election, legally held and legally declared by the proper ward officers, without even a charge of fraud or misconduct on their part and without specifying any error committed by them. He attempts to do this by substituting for the lawful returns a recount made by a committee of the board of aldermen of the city of Boston and a return made by the board on that recount of the ballots. Upon the theory of the sitting member, to entitle him to his seat, he must show that the recount and the return thereon were made in compliance with the law. He does not go outside of the record and attempt to prove his case. He relies upon a purely technical title. He sets up no equity in his own behalf and charges no wrong on the part of his adversary.

Judged by the record, whose title is best? The law says that—

The votes in elections for national, State, county, and district officers shall be received, sorted, and counted by the selectmen and by the ward officers, and public declaration made thereof in open town and ward meetings. The names of persons voted for, the number of votes received by each person and the title of the office for which he is proposed shall be entered in words at length by the town and ward clerks in their records.

The ward clerks shall forthwith deliver to the city clerk certified copies of such records, who shall forthwith enter the same in the city records.

The third congressional district of Massachusetts is wholly within the city of Boston. There is no question that the returns made by the ward officers, certified copies of which were forwarded by the ward clerks to the city clerk, give to Mr. Dean a majority of the votes of the district. The mayor and aldermen and the city clerk are required to examine the returns; if any errors appear the ward officers are to be notified and required to make new and additional returns in conformity to truth. The original and additional returns, if any, are to be examined by the mayor and aldermen and made part of the returns. The ward officers were never notified of any error in their returns, nor were they called on to make any corrections. Unless superseded or set aside by subsequent proceedings these returns must stand. Contestant claims that they have been invalidated by a recount made by a committee of the board of aldermen. The statute under which the recount and new returns was made is as follows:

If within three days next following the day of any election ten or more qualified voters of any ward shall file with the city clerk a statement in writing that they have reason to believe that the returns of the ward officers are erroneous, specifying wherein they deem them in error, said city clerk shall forthwith transmit such statement to the board of aldermen or the committee thereof appointed to examine the returns of said election. The board of aldermen or their committee shall thereupon * * * open the envelope and examine the ballots thrown in said ward and determine the questions raised; * * * and the envelope, sealed as aforesaid, shall be returned to the city clerk. Said city clerk, upon the certificate of the board of aldermen, shall alter and amend such ward returns as have been proved to be erroneous, and such amended returns shall stand as the true returns of the ward.

In each one of the ten wards included in the congressional district a statement was filed with the city clerk reciting by ten or more voters of the ward that they have reason to believe that the returns of the ward officers of said ward for member of Congress in said congressional district at the election of November 7, 1876, are erroneous, in that all the ballots cast for Walbridge A. Field as member of Congress were not counted and credited to him, and that more ballots were credited to Benjamin Dean as member of Congress than were cast for him. Thereupon a recount of the ballots in all the wards of said district was made by a committee of aldermen, and the result reported to the board. Upon that report the board passed an order directing "that in the certificate to be sent to the secretary of the Commonwealth the number of ballots for Mr. Field be returned as follows," &c., giving the number. The return made by the board of aldermen increased Dean's vote 7, and Field's 14. That return is the only evidence of title upon which the sitting member occupies a seat on this floor.

Mr. Speaker, I take the position that neither the board of aldermen nor their committee have the right to make the returns of the election upon which the certificate of election is to be issued. The ward clerks are required forthwith to deliver to the city clerk certified copies of the returns of the ward officers, and the city clerk is required forthwith to enter the same in the city records.

When upon examination by the board of aldermen, or their committee, upon charges by ten or more voters that errors in the returns were made by the ward officers, any such errors are discovered, the city clerk, upon the certificate of the aldermen, is required "to alter and amend such ward returns as have been proven to be erroneous, and such amended returns shall stand as the true returns of the ward."

The aldermen have no right to manufacture returns. They may direct the city clerk to "alter and amend such ward returns as have been proven to be erroneous." Under the authority to "alter and amend," the board of aldermen took the report of their committee in lieu of the returns of the ward officers, and amended that report by directing the city clerk to certify to the number of ballots received by Mr. Field, not in accordance with the report of their own committee, and entirely ignoring the returns of the ward officers. The clerk complied with the illegal order of the board of aldermen and forwarded to the secretary of state the illegal returns made by the aldermen. Upon that return the certificate of election was issued to the sitting member, and this is the purely technical title set up here in bar of the right of Mr. Dean, who brings before us the returns of the officers holding the election and making the returns, against whose conduct there is not a suspicion of fraud nor a specific charge of error.

It is claimed that the aldermanic count and return are valid under the fourth and fifth sections of chapter 188 of the laws of Massachusetts, passed in 1876, heretofore referred to. The statement made by the voters of the several wards under which the recount was made charges but two errors: First, that all the ballots cast for Field were not counted and credited to him; second, that more ballots were credited to Dean than were cast for him. These two questions could alone be determined by the aldermanic committee upon an examination of the ballots, for no other questions were "raised" by the voters making the statement on which the action was founded. The jurisdiction of the aldermen is limited by law to the questions "raised." As the "statement in writing" of the voters does not specify in what manner the error in counting by the ward officers occurred, nor specify the number of ballots or the particular ballots they failed to count and credit to Field, or how they happened to credit Dean with ballots he never received, it is difficult to perceive how the aldermen by examining the ballots could determine the questions raised. The committee of aldermen seem to have fully appreciated this difficulty, for they made no attempt to point out any errors by the ward officers. They reported none to the board of aldermen, and neither the committee nor the board made any attempt to correct any error in the returns of the ward officers.

The aldermanic committee, seeing that no error in the returns of the ward officers had been specified which upon examination of the ballots they could determine one way or the other, concluded that they would usurp the functions of the ward officers and count the ballots. This they did without any authority of law. But they found no ballots that had been legally cast for Mr. Field and not counted and credited to him, neither did they find that Dean had been credited with any ballots not cast for him. They did not point out in their report to the board of aldermen wherein the ward officers had committed any error. They simply counted over the ballots in the boxes, came to a different result from that found by the ward officers, reported to the board of aldermen the result of their count. The board substituted that unlawful count for the legal returns of the ward officers; changed the report so as to suit their own views and insure the certificate to Mr. Field. And this is claimed as a purely technical title, bare of every element of equity, to be used to overthrow the election of Mr. Dean as shown by the lawful and unimpeached returns of the officers whose sworn duty it was under the law to hold the election and count the ballots.

Mr. BUCKNER. Mr. Speaker, there are several questions of law as well as of fact involved in the correct decision of this case. I do not propose to look at all into the questions of fact; I leave them for others. I propose merely to examine into the authority under the law of Massachusetts by which this case, in my judgment, must be decided. We are here, as my friend from Georgia [Mr. CANDLER] said—and unfortunately he is absent to-day—we are here not as voters but as judges to decide the rights of these parties according to the law of Massachusetts.

Now, if the gentleman can show any decision of the judicial tribunals of Massachusetts construing the law which is here relied upon by either party, I would bow in humble acquiescence in that judgment. But as long as it is a question for the judgment of members of this House, as lawyers and as judges, I must be permitted to have my opinion as to what are the legal rights of these parties growing out of the laws of the State of Massachusetts.

I shall not go into a discussion of the question as to what are the powers of the supervisors appointed under United States law; I pass that by. According to my view those supervisors are not judicial officers empowered to determine the rights of these parties; nor do they get their power under the fourth section of the first article of the Constitution in reference to elections of members of this House. They derive their powers purely and simply from that provision of the Constitution which gives Congress the power to enforce by appropriate legislation the provisions of the fifteenth amendment of the Constitution.

Passing that by, leaving that for others, with merely this expression of my opinion, I say that there are in this case two counts, one of which is right and the other is wrong. It is claimed for Mr. Dean that he is entitled to the seat upon this floor on the ground that the ward officers, the proper officers, by their count gave him a majority of the votes. On the other hand it is claimed that Mr. Field is entitled to the seat here because of the action of the supervisory or revisory or appellate tribunal.

Now, there is no doubt but what if there had been no revision by the aldermanic board Mr. Dean would be entitled to a seat here. No one questions but what the ward officers were authorized by law and under the law to specially decide the question as to who received the majority of the votes cast, or rather who were elected at that election. The burden is therefore upon Mr. Field to show that the tribunal by which that election, or rather the count of the ward officers, was set aside was authorized by law; that the authority of the aldermanic board was beyond all question, and that the facts upon which they claim to act were supported by proper testimony.

I hold that under no fair construction of the act of Massachusetts, in pursuance of which the aldermanic board assumed control of this matter, had they any authority to act upon it at all; therefore their entire action is null and void.

Gentlemen have referred to what has been the practice in Massachusetts. I know nothing about that practice. A practice may have grown up there, in cases where there is a close vote, of allowing a recount as a necessary incident to the rights which belong to every candidate. I say that is no fair construction of this law. I call attention to the wording of the law.

After the officers appointed by law—the officers whom the law designates as the proper parties to determine this question—have decided what is the vote at the election, what then? As I said before, their decision is final, unless it is impeached. How? By anybody who may choose to come forward and ask the privilege of having a recount? Is that the meaning of the law? Has any candidate who imagines that the count has been false or is not correct, has he a right to come forward and ask the aldermanic board to make a recount to determine the question? Is that the meaning of this law? There is not a gentleman on this floor who will hold that doctrine.

Will any one contend that under the law of Massachusetts it is the right of any individual, without the specification of any facts charging fraud, or the statement of any circumstances showing that the election was unfair or improper, to ask for a recount upon the simple allegation that there is doubt in regard to the correctness of the announcement of the result? Nobody will affirm that proposition. Yet in point of fact that is the very ground upon which this case is to be determined in behalf of Mr. Field. It is in fact claiming that any man whom the returns show has been defeated can demand a recount upon a mere affirmation that there has been an error, without the specification of what that error is.

Hence it was that I asked my distinguished friend from New York, a member of the Committee of Elections, [Mr. HISCOCK,] if he must not necessarily strike out of the law the words "specifying wherein they deem them in error." I asked him if according to his construction those words were not necessarily eliminated, and that if they did not go upon the idea that no specification of error was to be made. I say that it is attempted here to give a construction to the law which the law-makers of Massachusetts, if they knew what language they were using, must have known could not be given to the language of the law which they passed. What is that law?

If within three days next following the day of any election ten or more qualified voters of any ward shall file with the city clerk a statement in writing that they have reasons to believe that the returns of the ward officers are erroneous, specifying wherein they deem them in error, said city clerk shall forthwith transmit such statement to the board of aldermen or the committee thereof appointed to examine the returns of said election.

Now suppose you strike out the words "specifying wherein they deem them in error;" do you not then state the ground of the argument upon the other side? You must necessarily eliminate those words from the law, in order to give the aldermanic board authority to make the recount which was made in this case.

By giving this statute a construction which amounts to nothing more than that where the vote is close either party may try a recount and take the chances, you open a door to fraud; you open a door to frivolous contests in order to determine whether the return of the officers appointed under the law, whose duty it is to see that the parties are properly dealt with, shall be set aside and another tribunal acting without authority in this matter shall determine the election. I say that such a construction is in fraud of the law.

The report of the minority in favor of Mr. Field says:

It is the opinion of your committee that these statements were sufficient in law to authorize the examination and count of the ballots cast in the several wards, by the board of aldermen.

What are the specifications? Merely that there had been an over-count on one side and an under-count on the other. Why, sir, if these 25 votes cast for Mr. Field as a member of Congress from the fourth district had been specified as the ground for a recount, there would have been reason for an examination as to that particular fact. But unless facts be asserted which give jurisdiction to the aldermanic board, I hold that their action in undertaking a recount is absolutely void. When the question is whether we shall give a seat here to a man who has received the majority of votes as returned by officers properly authorized, whose duty it was to examine and make such report, as against a man who is returned by persons assuming jurisdiction without authority, I cannot hesitate in my judgment, unless there can be shown some controlling decision of the courts of Massachusetts or some other tribunal authorized to decide this question. For my life I cannot see upon what legal ground the election is claimed for Mr. Field; for, as I have said, the aldermanic board in my opinion had no authority, under a proper construction of the law, to make the recount.

The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CANDLER] remarks that this was the same sort of proceeding which took place in the case of Abbott vs. Frost in the last Congress. That may be so; I know nothing about it. But I say that if such is the practice in Massachusetts it is an improper practice, a practice not justified by the statute; and no court in Christendom will hold it to be a proper construction of the law, that upon a general allegation of an over-count on one side and an under-count on the other, where the election is close, a recount can be had in order to take advantage of any possible mistake that may have been made. If upon such an allegation a recount can be had, then you can have a recount in any case; and you might as well strike out the words of the statute requiring the party to specify the grounds upon which he asks a recount.

Why, sir, there is a principle of common sense applicable here; a principle upon which the Committee of Elections in this very Congress acted in determining an application made in the case of Frost vs. Metcalfe. The application there was to open and recount the ballots where there was some dispute of about 10 or 15 votes; and the committee, as I understand, refused to order the recount until specific facts were shown to justify that action. This is in accordance with the law as laid down by McCrary. It is a principle applicable to all questions of this sort. Where the law imposes certain duties upon public officers, the legal presumption is that they have acted according to law; and in order to overturn that presumption you must make substantive allegations, and not mere vague suggestions; you must make statements of fact, which can be controverted or sustained before the tribunal which is to try them.

If the construction relied upon by the sitting member is correct, then in such case as this there is no necessity to do anything else than simply to ask the aldermanic board to make a recount, because the election is close and there may have been some mistake on one side or the other. I understand Mr. Field's title to depend exclusively upon that position; and I hold that such a position has not a particle of law to sustain it. I might on this question cite the decisions of the courts of Massachusetts in which they have affirmed the same general principle that, in order to reverse the action of an officer having jurisdiction by law to do a particular thing you must show affirmatively some grounds which will invalidate that action. I say no such grounds are shown here; and the parties might just as well have said: "Here is a close vote; we are in doubt who is elected, and therefore we ask for a recount." Is that the meaning of the statute? Will any gentleman from Massachusetts say that such is the practice in his State? [Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. SCALES. Mr. Speaker, in this election there have been two counts, the warden count and the aldermanic count. The aldermanic count is the last count, and if authorized by law is the final count, upon which the prima facie case is made out. Was this count, then, a legal count? And to determine this we must look at the statute which authorizes it, as well as the objects and purposes of those who framed it.

For more than one hundred years, by the law of Massachusetts, there had been but one count, and that was the first count in this case—the count at the polls known as the ward count. This had been deemed amply sufficient in the election of her governors, her Representatives, her State senators, and all other State officers, from the time she became a State down to 1833, and there had been no complaint. Why was the change made, and what was its purpose? Not to provide for another count in the absence of complaint, and most certainly not to provide for another count with proper complaint unless there could be added greater facilities for testing and verifying the original count.

If the first count, that had so long governed and controlled all elections in the State, was to be set aside, surely it would not be done simply because another and later count had reached a different result. All things else being equal, the last count could no more prove the first count erroneous than the first count would prove that the last count was erroneous. A counts $100 and hands it over to B to count, and B makes it ninety-five; who is right and who is wrong? A and B being equally honest and equally qualified in all respects, the count of one proves no more than the other, and leaves the mind in doubt, which must be settled in some other way. But if C should stand by while A counted, and say, "I have reason to believe that A made a mistake, and my reason is that I saw A count ten bills. Nine were ten-dollar bills, and the last was a five-dollar bill; and that A counted this last as he did all the others as a ten-dollar bill, and thus made up the $100." This was a good reason; and should be considered, and might well and sensibly form the basis of an appeal to B. Calling his attention to a specified error, B would count with special reference to this, and if he found that there was one five-dollar bill in the roll of notes every one would say at once the last count was the true one, the error was specified, pointed out and found to exist just as C had witnessed it, and therefore all the presumptions are in favor of it.

So in our case. The Legislature did not intend to do anything so absurd and unreasonable as to appeal from one count to another without investing the last count with something, either in the qualification of those who counted or in the circumstances under which the count took place, which would bring conviction that the last was the better and true count. Any other construction of the law would be a slander upon the legislative body, and I stand ready to vindicate it, if such vindication were necessary; but it is not needed; the language of the act vindicates it to every unprejudiced mind. In her great jealousy over the ballot-box, and in her great desire that every vote should not only be counted but that all should be satisfied it was counted fairly, the State provides, in 1863, more than one hundred years after the first and only count was established, that if within three days next following the day of any election ten or more qualified voters of any ward shall file with the city clerk a statement in writing, that they have reason to believe that the returns of the ward officers are erroneous, specifying wherein they deem them in error, said city clerk shall forthwith transmit such statement to the board of aldermen or the committee thereof appointed to examine the returns of said election.

Now, if ten voters shall say in writing that they have reason to believe that the returns are erroneous and shall specify the error, then the first count, so long the true and unaltered count in the history of Massachusetts, shall be subjected to a revisory count. They must have reasons, and not only must they have them but they must state they have them, and not only must they state they have them but they must specify the reasons themselves, and thus point out the special error, as required by the statute, that the appellate board of count should have their attention called to the specific complaint, and try that and that alone, and when that is done there would be reason, good and satisfactory reason, to believe the last count would be correct.

Now, let us see whether this law has been complied with; if not, then the last count is void; for the statute must be strictly complied with, and without this compliance it would be nothing more nor less than an appeal from the count of A to the count of B, which must leave, if they differ, the whole in doubt, and will deprive the people of all confidence in the "result of any election" thus obtained.

The notice says in so many words that the count was erroneous in that all the ballots cast for W. A. Field were not counted and credited to him, and that more ballots were counted for Benjamin Dean than were cast for him. Does this specify the error? Could the complaint be in more general terms? One received too many and the other did not receive enough. Or, in other words, the count was wrong. But they were required to state that they had reasons to believe that the count was wrong. What were the reasons for the supposed wrong? The law demands them and will not be satisfied without them, and without them there can be no ground for an appeal and no sense in a recount. With them the error will be sufficiently specified.

The assertion is that there was error, and that they have reason to believe there was error. Can it satisfy the law to say there was error, for the reason that there was error? Surely the bare statement will refute any such idea. But the reason for the belief that there is a wrong is what we want, what the law demands, and no proceeding is valid without it. Give us that. Let the aldermen know them, and then let them test these reasons, and all will bow to the recount and abide by it. It is contended by the advocates for the last count that the notice was in compliance with the law. Let us test it again by the language itself of the law. The count was erroneous, for the reason that one got too many votes and the other too few; but what we want is the reason for believing, which you said you had, that one got too many and the other got too few. Will it, can it be insisted upon that such an absurdity was intended by the law? Surely not. In support of our view we have the cases cited by the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. SPRINGER,] which are in point, Carpenter's case and Kneass's case, decided in Pennsylvania. In these cases the court says in substance:

We were forced as soon as the law passed giving this court appellate jurisdiction to the necessity of assimilating all such to other legal proceedings. We demanded of the parties seeking to impeach an election return preciseness and exactitude of allegation, refusing to recognize all general charges.

[Here the hammer fell, and, upon motion of Mr. SPRINGER, Mr. SCALES was allowed by unanimous consent of the House to proceed.]

If these decisions apply to our case, then it is settled. Why do they not apply? I have listened in vain for anything that approaches an answer. Indeed the statute uses almost the same language as the court, and surely there is no error in giving it the same construction. Next we are supported beyond successful refutation by the legislative cases also cited with so much point by the distinguished gentleman from Illinois. These cases declare that unless the petitioner shows a reasonable ground for supposing an error in the count other than the mere closeness of the vote the committee will not recount the ballots. The force of these decisions is felt by the learned gentleman from New York, [Mr. POTTER,] and he attempts to parry it by saying that these precedents requiring such specification relate to legislative recounts and not to the statutory one in question. But the gentleman does not condescend to tell us why the Legislature should insist so much upon the specification when they recount, and yet require no specification when it makes a law providing for another count. The same reasoning applies to both, and there certainly is as much reason for specification in the aldermanic count which has only a restrictive jurisdiction as in the legislative account that had full and complete jurisdiction of the whole matter. Consider it for a moment. In 1863 the Legislature pass a law, according to the gentleman from New York, and re-enacts it in 1876, which changes a law of count that is now one hundred years old, upon a general statement of any ten voters that they believe the count is wrong, and yet in 1872 and before and afterward the same Legislature says of itself, "We will not recount unless the error is precisely and specifically pointed out." In other words, "We will allow to the board a greater license than we claim ourselves." They meant no such thing, they said no such thing; their language shows it; to insist upon it is to charge the Legislature with folly.

Again, we are supported by the only construction given so far as I know in the State, and that is the construction of the city solicitor in Lynn. In this case the grounds for the recount as given were much more specific, to wit, that "they believed the returns to be erroneous, as we learn that three or four counts were made and no two agreed;" and yet in this case the solicitor says:

They have wholly failed to specify wherein they deem them in error, and in want of such specifications there is no question for the aldermen or committee to determine.

This is unmistakable, and, if right, should settle the case. This view is also fully sustained by McCrary on Elections. Indeed, it does seem to us not only that there is an entire absence of respectable authority to sustain the view contended for by the friends of Mr. Field, but it is directly in the face of sound reason and common sense. If the law has not been complied with in giving the notice, then the board of aldermen had no jurisdiction and their count or that of the committee is simply void, and that is the end of this case.

Mr. HARRIS, of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I propose to discuss this case entirely upon its merits and as if it were about to be decided by a wholly just and impartial tribunal; and I trust I do not rely too confidently upon the hope that there is to be found in this House a spirit of exact justice. If the House were evenly divided between the two great political parties, I might expect little success from such a mode of argument, but this House is so decidedly in the control of one party that there would seem to be little temptation for that party to do wrong for the sake of a single additional vote.

The other party is in such an infirm minority that it can hardly be tempted, for the purpose of securing an additional vote, to forget the obligations of justice.

Mr. Speaker, the contestants here I assume to be gentlemen seeking not their own personal success, but that the cause of their constituents shall be decided justly and according to the law and the fact. To assume that either of them would be willing to accept and occupy a seat upon this floor to which the people of his district had not legally and constitutionally called him, would be to presume him utterly unworthy of so great an honor. This is the people's contest and not theirs, and we are to endeavor to settle it with reference to the rights of the people alone.

Now, sir, by the laws of Massachusetts, and by the laws of most of the States, if not all, a plurality of ballots elects a member of Congress, a law recognized by the States, by the United States, and by Congress; and a plurality of 5 votes is as sacred under the law as a plurality of 100 votes. This House is the judge, under the Constitution, of the election and qualification of its own members. In coming to this judgment it may properly and wisely follow precedent, but no precedent can control the conscience and judgment of this House. It has a right to exercise the utmost freedom. It is at perfect liberty to make the investigation as broad and as wide as it pleases, and if it follows precedent and makes investigation solely with a purpose to do exact justice, it is safe in that liberty.

The Constitution, article 1, section 4, provides:

The times, places, and manner of holding elections for Senators and Representatives shall be prescribed in each State by the Legislature thereof; but the Congress may at any time by law make or alter such regulations, except as to the places of choosing Senators.

This provision of the Constitution is mandatory upon the States. The power reserved to Congress is merely permissive, and I suppose no gentleman on this floor will claim that when a Commonwealth of this Republic has, under the mandatory clause of the Constitution, provided a system of laws calculated to secure a fair and free and pure election, and that an election held in accordance with such system has been conducted honestly and fairly, and a result has been determined according to the law, that such result ought to be disregarded here. Such a result so reached will certainly be respected unless Congress has exercised its reserved power and changed the law. I assume so much. Now, Massachusetts, loyal to the Constitution in this as in other respects, has provided a system of laws for the election of Representatives to Congress. That system was evidently established for the purpose of securing the freedom of the elector, and of gathering up at the end the result of the election with unflinching certainty and truth.

The laws of Massachusetts provide, first, as to who shall be voters. Every native-born citizen of twenty-one years of age and every naturalized citizen who can read and write, and who has within two years of the day of the election paid a tax, municipal, county, or State, shall have the right to vote for all officers, State, county, town, city, and national. The registration of the voters shall take place before the day of election, and under our law in all cities the aldermen, who take charge of the election, are not allowed to put on the voting-list the name of a single individual whose right to vote has not been determined at a meeting held prior to the day of election. We then come to the election itself. The law provides that in cities there shall be at each ward a warden who presides at the election, three inspectors elected by the people, and for greater security three inspectors appointed by the mayor of the city, and a clerk.

On the day of voting ordinarily, I believe, in the city of Boston there are three ballot-boxes in each ward-room, and at each ballot-box there are stationed two inspectors, one with a section of the checklist in his hand, whose duty it is to find and check the name of the voter before he is allowed to deposit his ballot, and the other in charge of the ballot-box, the warden presiding over all, and the clerk is present to make a record, and assist as his services may be required in sorting and counting the votes.

Now, sir, under a system guarded like this we may naturally conclude and expect that the result of the election will be the expression, and the exact expression, of the will of the people. But what next? When the ballots are all in they shall be sorted, counted, sealed up, record of them made in open ward meeting, and the declaration of the vote made before the election can be declared concluded and finished.

The statute is in the following words:

SEC. 15. The votes in elections for national, State, county, and district officers shall be received, sorted, and counted by the selectmen and by the ward officers, and public declaration made thereof in open town and ward meetings. The names of persons voted for, the number of votes received for each person and the title of the office for which he is proposed shall be entered in words at length by the town and ward clerks in their records. The ward clerks shall forthwith deliver to the city clerks certified copies of such records, who shall forthwith enter the same in the city records.

SEC. 17. City and town clerks shall, within ten days from the day of an election for governor, lieutenant-governor, councilors, senators, secretary, treasurer, and receiver-general, auditor, attorney-general, Representatives in Congress, commissioners of insolvency, sheriffs, registers of probate and insolvency, district attorneys, or clerks of courts, transmit copies of the records of the votes, attested by them, certified by the mayor and aldermen or selectmen and sealed up, to the secretary of the Commonwealth.

The clerk must make a transcript of his record and that transcript must be sealed and sent to the city clerk. What more? After all this has been done the warden reads the record thus made in the presence of the voters there assembled, which makes the public declaration that the law requires. The ballots themselves must be sealed up in order that there may be no chance that any fraud shall be committed upon the voters of any ward in the city, and the ballots thus sealed up must be transmitted on the night of the election to the city clerk to be placed by him under lock and key in the city hall. For what, Mr. Speaker? Why transmit the record and the ballots also, and require them to be kept under lock and key? Why, if that election can never be inquired into for any reason?

Mr. Speaker, there is no question that every act required by the laws of Massachusetts in these respects was honestly, intelligently, and faithfully executed, so that at the close of the election on the 7th day of November, 1876, there had been no act committed by any man connected with that election which can hereafter be referred to as a dishonest or fraudulent act. The ballots were all in the city hall. The record was in the city hall; and nobody denies it to-day.

Mr. Speaker, my friend who makes the majority report from the committee makes wonderful confusion in regard to the language "recorded in words at length." He tells us in his report that the result of the election must be "recorded in words at length in the ward record." I agree to that. He says next it must be "recorded in words at length in the city record." I deny that. He next states that it must be "copied in words at length" in the return to the governor of the Commonwealth; which I also deny.

Mr. Speaker, the Commonwealth of Massachusetts recognizes in making returns municipalities, towns and cities; not wards or parts of towns. The ward clerk must make his record in the ward record-book before the election is closed, and he must do it in "words at length," and there it is to remain forever and cannot be changed. There is no power in the Commonwealth to change a ward record. But the law requires that the ward records shall be transcribed and the copy sent to the city clerk. The city clerk makes the final record of the election. He makes the record of a unit, of a city, not of a ward, and no law requires him to record in wards at length the voluminous transcripts of the records of the ward clerk. He will gather under their appropriate heads the ballots for governor and record them, taking item by item from the ward records; he gathers under one head the votes for Representative of Congress from the third congressional district, taking them from the ward records as they come in and tabulating them upon his record necessarily.

The city clerk of Boston well understands his duty and how to truthfully record upon the city records the returns which come up to him from the several wards. Extracting from these returns every item of fact which they are intended to furnish him with, he places these items each in its proper place and under its proper heading, so that when his record is completed it shows at a glance, and with as great simplicity as would a town record in which there was but one polling-place, the result of the election in the whole city. Such a system tabulates as well as records. If it is a correct record it is in accordance with law, for while the law has specified how a ward clerk shall make his record it has not descended to the absurd details of directing the mode of keeping a city record. The city clerk must "forthwith enter" the ward returns in the city record, but to enter is not equivalent to "recording in words at length." The ward returns are of course entered by him as a part of the city record and may always be referred to, but to copy them entire into the city record would serve no good purpose.

Mr. McCleary, the city clerk of Boston, has had twenty-five years' experience, has been elected almost unanimously by both parties, is respected by everybody, and this is perhaps the first time that his judgment as to the modes of keeping the records of his great city has ever been questioned. The expression "words at length" occurs but once in the law, and when the gentleman undertakes to spread those words further he certainly makes a great error. But I pass over what I believe to be a misquotation of the committee or a misinterpretation of the meaning of the law.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the ward officers finished their duty and transmitted their ballots and their record to the city hall. But is that the end of an election in Massachusetts? Is that the complete execution of the law in Massachusetts? The proposition contended for here to-day is that the law of Massachusetts shall not go on to its final and complete execution; that we shall be obliged to take this ward count with all its errors upon its head; that we are stopped from ever finding what the voters said.

Mr. Speaker, I hold in my hand the city record, the record of the aldermen of the city of Boston, and I turn to page 745 for the year 1877. It is a recount for representative to the house of representatives of Massachusetts, and I find a recount under this law which we are now trying to execute.

I find in one ward, ward 8, the following to have been the result of the recount: Francis Granger in ward 8 is returned by the ward officers as having 788 votes; the official count returns 667. I will read the ward and then the official counts: Thomas L. Locke, 605; 625. Dennis O'Connor, 621; 526. I turn to ward 12: Edward J. Jenkins, 702; 712. Patrick Hamlin, 585; 592. And if gentlemen would take pains to investigate the various recounts which have been had under this law in Massachusetts they would find there are numerous errors detected every year in the ward counts which are corrected precisely as the errors in this count were corrected. It is the system. Everybody knows, no gentleman here need be told, that at the close of a hotly contested election in a great city with from one hundred to five hundred people hustling around the ballot-box, often excited and turbulent, errors innumerable are committed. The Commonwealth of Massachusetts recognized the fact and the danger, and provided a system of law by which these inevitable errors could be corrected. And yet this House says or may say that that effort of Massachusetts to secure purity of election shall be disregarded.

Mr. Speaker, the official count took place at the city hall. It is said against it by the committee, and I think it has been said upon this floor by some gentlemen, that this count was had in secret. In secret at the city hall! Sir, it was held in the city hall of Boston, in a spacious apartment near to the vault in which the ballots were kept, the only proper place for the discharge of so important a duty, under a blaze of gas-light so bright as to make the "midnight outshine the noon-day sun." In secret! that in the proposition. The recount was made by the three aldermen authorized by law to make it, and the presence of any unauthorized person would have rendered it, if not unlawful, yet of questionable authority.

The city clerk was called upon for the ballot-boxes. He brought them with their seals unbroken. Of the aldermen two were democrats and one republican, and there is no gentleman upon this floor who would question the integrity or honesty of either of them. Each one was counting for himself, and they never ceased until they all agreed.

But, Mr. Speaker, it is said that the count took place partly in the night-time. It took place in the night-time only because the sun set before their arduous labors could be completed; and there never was a more honest, straightforward act performed than that which was performed by those three aldermen in that city hall.

But, Mr. Speaker, what did they count? Gentlemen on the other side claim, and I presume they rely upon it, that the ward counts were perfectly correct and that therefore the aldermanic count cannot be correct. Let us look at the ward count as made, made as I have said, under circumstances such as I have recounted. The record was made, the ballots sealed up.

Gentlemen say that the men who counted the votes in the wards assert that their count is right. Grant that they thought so, but they say something more: all the ward clerks and two inspectors swear that they sealed up all the ballots cast at that election. If that is true, their testimony proves too much. It is no use to say that they counted correctly and rest there, for they also say they "sealed up all the ballots cast and none other;" therefore, unless you believe that the aldermen who made the recount did not count correctly in the city hall, you must concede that the ward officers committed errors in their count. The committee of aldermen counted the ballots which had been furnished to them by the ward officers "and none others," and they counted them exactly as the law of Massachusetts required, according to its letter, and then they made a declaration of the result and caused it to be recorded by the clerk, and a copy as prescribed by law was sent to the governor. The law of Massachusetts was executed in every feature and in every particular.

Now, if that is true, and nothing has been done by the authorities of Massachusetts but to execute the law which the Constitution of the United States by its mandate required the State to enact, then I ask why not accept the voice of Massachusetts, thus constitutionally uttered?

But this House, as I have said, has a right, independent of all other questions, to inquire which of the contestants had the most ballots, and in determining that question may disregard all counts and all forms. If it be true, as is claimed, Mr. Dean had the most, he is entitled to this seat, and Mr. Field ought to surrender it to him. This count of the aldermen was made with great care and deliberation, under circumstances favorable to accuracy. They were making it with full knowledge of its importance, and that upon its accuracy depended the question of who should hold a seat in this House. They had admonition wanting to the ward officers when they made their count. They found errors in the count in every one of the ten wards composing the third district. The total number of errors was 84.

By the official count Mr. Dean gained 2 in ward 13, 25 in ward 14, and 1 in ward 17, a total of 28. He lost 7 in ward 16, 6 in ward 18, 1 in ward 19, 3 in ward 20, 2 in ward 21, and 2 in ward 24, a total of 21. So that by the official recount he made a net gain of 7 votes over the ward count.

Mr. Field gained 6 in ward 13, 11 in ward 14, 4 in ward 16, 3 in ward 18, 2 in ward 21, and 1 in ward 24, or a total gain of 27. But he lost 2 in ward 15, and 6 in ward 20, a total of 8, leaving him a net gain of 19.

By the ward count Mr. Dean had been found to be elected by a plurality of 7. In the re-count Mr. Field made a net gain of 12 more than Mr. Dean, which wiped out Dean's plurality of 7 and left him with a plurality of 5. If this was a true and honest count it settles the question of who had the most votes, and therefore who is entitled to a seat on this floor. I have heard no one deny that the aldermen counted correctly the ballots which were found sealed in the boxes which the city clerk brought to them. I think that is an undisputed fact, if not indeed an admitted one.

But it has been said by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BUCKNER] that there was no jurisdiction for the official count, that it was not justified by law, and that however correct it may have been it ought not to have been made, and that therefore it cannot bind us. He urges with great persistence and with great apparent confidence that the notice which was given by Mr. Field's friends was not adequate to give jurisdiction to the aldermen to make the recount.

Here is the law of Massachusetts on the subject:

SEC. 4. If within three days next following the day of any election ten or more qualified voters of any ward shall file with the city clerk a statement in writing that they have reason to believe that the returns of the ward officers are erroneous, specifying wherein they deem them in error, said city clerk shall forthwith transmit such statement to the board of aldermen or the committee thereof appointed to examine the returns of said election. The board of aldermen, or their committee, shall thereupon, and within five days, Sunday excepted, next following the day of election, open the envelope and examine the ballots thrown in said ward, and determine the questions raised; they shall then again seal the envelope, either with the seal of the city or a seal provided for the purpose, and shall indorse upon said envelope a certificate that the same has been opened and again sealed by them in conformity to law; and the envelope, sealed as aforesaid, shall be returned to the city clerk. Said city clerk, upon the certificate of the board of aldermen or their committee, shall alter and amend such ward returns as have been proved to be erroneous, and such amended returns shall stand as the true returns of the ward.

SEC. 5. The board of aldermen shall not declare the result of an election until the time specified in the preceding section for filing a request for a recount of ballots shall have expired, or, in case of such request having been made, until the said ballots have been examined and the returns amended, if found erroneous, any provision in the charter of any city or in any act in amendment thereof to the contrary notwithstanding.

It must be borne in mind that this was a recount provided for by law as a part of the process provided for determining the result of an election, one of the steps to be taken when demanded for that purpose.

A recount by a legislative body is quite another thing, and he cites in defense of his position the action of the Legislature of Massachusetts upon certain cases in which a legislative recount was asked for. And yet legislative counts are quite proper in cases where it can be made certain that all the ballots cast are at hand and have been had long after an election has been concluded.

What precise allegation of fact might be proper in a petition for a recount by a Legislature I cannot say; but the statute of Massachusetts declares exactly what shall be sufficient under her election laws, as we have seen.

In this case it appears Mr. Field offered to allow the ballots which had been brought here for the use of the committee to be recounted at this late day, and to abide by the result. His offer was not accepted.

The friends of Mr. Field complied strictly with the law, and made use of this form of notice:

To the CITY CLERK of the City of Boston:

The undersigned, qualified voters of ward 13, in the third congressional district, hereby state that they have reason to believe that the returns of the ward officers of said ward for member of Congress in said congressional district at the election of November 7, 1876, are erroneous, in that all the ballots cast for Walbridge A. Field as member of Congress were not counted and credited to him, and that more ballots were credited to Benjamin Dean as a member of Congress than were cast for him; and they ask for a recount of the vote of said ward for member of Congress, in accordance with the provisions of section 4 of chapter 188 of the acts of the year 1876.

My friend says that is too general. Judge Abbott, who has done us the honor to lay his printed argument upon our tables, has taken that position at last. Let me say here, however, that before the return was finished and decided upon in the city hall after the recount, the distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts, Mr. Abbott, was himself before the board of aldermen, and there he did not question the right of that board to make the recount. There was then no question about the jurisdiction of those officers. There were 25 votes which had been cast in ward 18 for Walbridge A. Field for the fourth district. By striking those votes out the recount by the aldermen would have had no effect; Mr. Dean would still have been declared elected. By counting them for Mr. Field, he would have been elected.

The struggle then was to strike out those 25 votes entirely from Mr. Field's credit, although no man anywhere, who knows anything about elections, doubts that they were honest votes cast for Mr. Field by legal voters. The honorable Committee of Elections of this House has reported here that those 25 votes should be counted for Mr. Field. The struggle in Boston was to wipe those honest votes out of existence.

Now, I claim that no words could more clearly state the proposition than those used in this petition. How could you say that more votes had been cast for Mr. Field than had been counted for him except by the use of the language here employed? What language would you use to say that Mr. Dean had too many votes counted for him than had been cast for him except the precise language used in this notice? Would it have helped the matter to have stated precise numbers? If the facts stated were true, a recount was demanded by every principle of justice. The law of Massachusetts has declared that if ten voters had reason to believe it true, they had a right to a recount upon making the allegation in writing as of their belief.

But perhaps this House desires democratic authority. I believe I might appeal to my friend Mr. Morse to admit that in his district at the last election there was a recount of the ballots cast for the different candidates upon precisely this notice. During the last Congress Mr. Abbott, who places his argument in this case upon our tables here, was a member of this House. He had a recount under the statute of 1874. His friends made application to the city government of Chelsea, one of the cities of Massachusetts. What was the language used? The following is a copy of the petition, omitting the names:

To SAMUEL BASSETT, Esq.,

City Clerk of the City of Chelsea:

We, the undersigned, being legal voters of ward one in said Chelsea, notify you that we have reason to believe that the returns of the ward officers in said ward are erroneous, in that they give too many votes for Rufus S. Frost for Representative to Congress for the fourth district and too few votes for Josiah G. Abbott as Representative to Congress for the fourth district, and they demand a recount of said votes and an examination of said returns.

It will be noticed that the difference is slight and more in form than in substance. That Mr. Field's case regards the courtesies of official station and requests a recount, while the other demands it as if sure he was right and entitled as of right to a recount. The difference, in manner and substance, is in favor of Mr. Field, "in that they gave too many votes for Rufus S. Frost for Representative of Congress for the fourth district and too few votes for Josiah G. Abbott."

That was their understanding of the law. I do not believe that any gentleman upon this floor will have the audacity to tell me that Judge Abbott did not understand those words, and did not see the language before it was made use of in his case. It was good enough for Judge Abbott and for Chelsea, but it is not good enough for my distinguished friend, Mr. Field, and the city of Boston. Sir, what was good enough for Judge Abbott and Chelsea ought to be good enough elsewhere in the Commonwealth of Massachusetts.

Mr. SPRINGER. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. HARRIS, of Massachusetts. I have but a few minutes left. You have already had your hour, and you have discussed this proposition; I only reply.

Mr. SPRINGER. I yielded to you frequently.

Mr. HARRIS, of Massachusetts. Yes, you did, and I will yield to you.

Mr. SPRINGER. The gentleman has stated that Judge Abbott was responsible for the petition in the Chelsea case.

Mr. HARRIS, of Massachusetts. I beg your pardon; I made no such statement.

Mr. SPRINGER. That was the inference that I drew. That was a petition of ten electors in that ward. And if the petition of ten electors is to be brought before the House as of equal authority with the decision of a court binding upon this House as to the construction of a statute, then I yield the point.

Mr. HARRIS, of Massachusetts. I do not see that any question has been put to me. I made the statement that I believed no one would say that Judge Abbott was not consulted upon the language used in that petition; that is all I mean to say. Judge Abbott came into Congress, not by a recount, he had other resources; he was admitted here for other reasons. Yet so far as I know he never manifested any hostility to the proposition that it was wise for Congress to "go behind the returns" in order to get at the honest result of an election.

Now if we are honestly seeking to ascertain what was the voice of this congressional district of Massachusetts, it seems to me that we are at liberty to go behind any returns or any count made by anybody, and to seek for the real vote by whatever means in our power.

The majority of the committee asks this House to adhere to the ward returns, which, upon the most conclusive proof, are shown to have been erroneous; and to shut our ears to the testimony given according to law, having the same authority as that authorizing the ward count, and declared to be final and conclusive.

Now here we have a tribunal acting under the law of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts, selected beforehand by the aldermen of the city of Boston, who are charged with all matters relating to the election. The aldermen selected two very respectable democrats and one republican. That is the tribunal which declares that the count made in the city hall is the honest, true, and just count, and that Mr. Walbridge A. Field was elected. That count takes no votes from Mr. Dean, but gives him seven more than the ward count; and it takes none from Mr. Field, but gives him nineteen more than the ward count.

Mr. McCrary, in his book upon elections, says:

Before the ballots shall be allowed in evidence to overturn official counts or returns it should appear affirmatively that they have been safely kept by the proper custodian of the law, and that they have not been exposed to the public or handled by unauthorized persons, and that no opportunity has been given for tampering with them.

That is the law, as quoted by the committee, and by it we are willing to be tried. When this House remembers the care with which these ballots were preserved, that a few days only elapsed before they were recounted, that they were counted by three men, two of whom desired a different result, counted by gentlemen against whom no man makes the charge of having counted wrongly, it would seem that the question of who had the most ballots can no longer be an open one.

I claim that the election as provided by the law of Massachusetts was lawfully and honestly conducted; that every requirement of the law was obeyed; that every vote of everybody entitled to vote was counted, and that the result showed that Walbridge A. Field was elected the constitutional representative of the third congressional district of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts.

I leave this branch of the subject believing that according to the law of Massachusetts there is no taint upon the title of the sitting member. I now turn to a consideration of that provision of the Constitution of the United States which authorizes Congress to make or alter the regulations of the respective States with reference to the times, places, and manner of holding elections for Representatives in Congress. I admit that Congress has the power reserved to it in the Constitution. I care not where we find the power to make any regulation governing the manner of holding elections for Representatives in Congress, and it does not seem to me important that I should stop and decide the question as to the precise place in the Constitution where that power may be found. I grant that it exists.

But, sir, to say that a power exists in the Constitution is not equivalent to saying that the power has been exercised. I deny that there has been any legislation of Congress changing the "manner" of holding elections in the State of Massachusetts. The manner of holding those elections has been fixed by that State, and it exists to-day as it did on the 7th of November, 1876, as the State had fixed it, unless Congress has made some law changing it. Let us examine and see whether there has been any such change. I presume it will not be claimed that Congress has provided by law a system under which an election could have been held in Massachusetts. What has the law of the United States provided about the registry of voters, about the place of voting, the manner of voting, the check-lists of the officers who preside at elections? Not one word anywhere. I hold that under the provision of the United States Revised Statutes no election could have been held in the State of Massachusetts. Congress has not provided the "manner" of holding elections, &c.

But it may be asserted that the Revised Statutes have in some way altered the law of the State, taking something from it or adding something to it. This position also I think is incorrect. To alter a law is to change in some respects its substance; and a law of the United States which undertakes to change in every State the law regulating elections ought to be specific. It certainly ought to have the same application in one county of the State that it has in another and the same application at one hour in the afternoon as at another hour. But I shall show hereafter, I think, that the law of Congress, if it varies or repeals the State law at all, does so according as the inspector happens to be attending to his business. But it may be claimed that if the United States law has not repealed the State law absolutely it has provided for its temporary suspension at times and in certain places at the will of ten voters, and this seems to me to be the extent which can be claimed for it; and this is no more tenable than the other.

If this is the position, the United States has not exercised a power under the Constitution to make a regulation by law altering a State law, but, leaving the State law intact, it has provided that ten voters in any locality may obstruct its execution if their caprice so dictates. This is a mode of altering a State law unheard of before, and I think never contemplated by the Constitution.

The sections of the Revised Statutes which are relied upon to establish the repeal or suspension of the State law are the following. I put in italics the expressions which seem to me to declare the purpose of the law:

SEC. 2011. Whenever, in any city or town having upward of twenty thousand inhabitants, there are two citizens thereof, or whenever, in any county or parish, in any congressional district, there are ten citizens thereof, of good standing, who, prior to any registration of voters for an election for Representative or Delegate in the Congress of the United States, or prior to any election at which a Representative or Delegate in Congress is to be voted for, may make known, in writing, to the judge of the circuit court of the United States for the circuit wherein such city or town, county or parish, is situated, their desire to have such registration, or such election, or both, guarded and scrutinized, the judge, within not less than ten days prior to the registration, if one there be, or, if no registration be required, within not less than ten days prior to the election, shall open the circuit court at the most convenient point in the circuit.

SEC. 2012. The court, when so opened by the judge, shall proceed to appoint and commission, from day to day and from time to time, and under the hand of the judge, and under the seal of the court, for each election district or voting-precinct in such city or town, or for such election district or voting-precinct in the congressional district as may have applied in the manner hereinbefore prescribed, and to revoke, change, or renew such appointment from time to time, two citizens, residents of the city or town, or of the election district or voting-precinct in the county or parish, who shall be of different political parties and able to read and write the English language, and who shall be known and designated as supervisors of election. (See sections 5521, 5522.)

SEC. 2013. The circuit court, when opened by the judge as required in the two preceding sections, shall therefrom and thereafter, and up to and including the day following the day of election, be always open for the transaction of business under this title, and the powers and jurisdiction hereby granted and conferred shall be exercised as well in vacation as in term time; and a judge sitting at chambers shall have the same powers and jurisdiction, including the power of keeping order and of punishing any contempt of his authority, as when sitting in court.

SEC. 2014. Whenever, from any cause, the judge of the circuit court in any judicial circuit is unable to perform and discharge the duties herein imposed, he is required to select and assign to the performance thereof, in his place, such one of the judges of the district courts within his circuit as he may deem best; and upon such selection and assignment being made, the district judge so designated shall perform and discharge, in the place of the circuit judge, all the duties, powers, and obligations imposed and conferred upon the circuit judge by the provisions hereof.

SEC. 2015. The preceding section shall be construed to authorize each of the judges of the circuit courts of the United States to designate one or more of the judges of the district courts within his circuit to discharge the duties arising under this title.

SEC. 2016. The supervisors of election, so appointed, are authorized and required to attend at all times and places fixed for the registration of voters, who, being registered, would be entitled to vote for a Representative or Delegate in Congress, and to challenge any person offering to register: to attend at all times and places when the names of registered voters may be marked for challenge, and to cause such names registered as they may deem proper to be so marked; to make, when required, the lists, or either of them, provided for in section 2026, and verify the same; and upon any occasion, and at any time when in attendance upon the duty herein prescribed, to personally inspect and scrutinize such registry, and for purposes of identification to affix their signature to each page of the original list and of each copy of any such list of registered voters, at such times, upon each day when any name may be received, entered, or registered, and in such manner as will, in their judgment, detect and expose the improper or wrongful removal therefrom or addition thereto of any name.

SEC. 2017. The supervisors of election are authorized and required to attend at all times and places for holding elections of Representatives or Delegates in Congress, and for counting the votes cast at such elections; to challenge any vote offered by any person whose legal qualifications the supervisors, or either of them, may doubt; to be and remain where the ballot-boxes are kept at all times after the polls are open until every vote cast at such time and place has been counted, the canvass of all votes polled wholly completed, and the proper and requisite certificates or returns made, whether the certificates or returns be required under any law of the United States, or any State, territorial, or municipal law, and to personally inspect and scrutinize, from time to time, and at all times, on the day of election, the manner in which the voting is done, and the way and method in which the poll-books, registry-lists, and tallies or check-books, whether the same are required by any law of the United States, or any State, territorial, or municipal law, are kept.

SEC. 2018. To the end that each candidate for the office of Representative or Delegate in Congress may obtain the benefit of every vote for him cast, the supervisors of election are, and each of them is, required to personally scrutinize, count, and canvass each ballot in their election district or voting-precinct cast, whatever may be the indorsement on the ballot or in whatever box it may have been placed or be found; to make and forward to the officer who, in accordance with the provisions of section 2025, has been designated as the chief supervisor of the judicial district in which the city or town wherein they may serve, acts, such certificates and returns of all such ballots as each officer may direct and require, and to attach, to the registry-list, and any and all copies thereof, and to any certificate, statement, or return, whether the same, or any part or portion thereof, be required by any law of the United States, or of any State, territorial, or municipal law, any statement touching the truth or accuracy of the registry or the truth or fairness of the election and canvass, which the supervisors of the election, or either of them, may desire to make or attach, or which should properly and honestly be made or attached, in order that the facts may become known.

SEC. 2019. The better to enable the supervisors of election to discharge their duties, they are authorized and directed, in their respective election districts or voting-precincts, on the day of registration, on the day when registered voters may be marked to be challenged, and on the day of election, to take occupancy, and remain in such position, from time to time, whether before or behind the ballot-boxes, as will, in their judgment, best enable them to see each person offering himself for registration or offering to vote, and as will best conduce to their scrutinizing the manner in which the registration or voting is being conducted; and at the closing of the polls for the reception of votes, they are required to place themselves in such position, in relation to the ballot-boxes, for the purpose of engaging in the work of canvassing the ballots, as will enable them to fully perform the duties in respect to such canvass provided herein, and shall there remain until every duty in respect to such canvass, certificates, returns, and statements has been wholly completed.

I maintain that these provisions of law were intended to secure the perfect and complete execution of the State law—nothing else. Section 2011 provides that a certain number of voters may have inspectors appointed, if they make application within a certain time, where they desire to have the election "guarded and scrutinized." This is the language of the law: "guarded and scrutinized." These supervisors are to "guard" the election, how? Under the laws of Massachusetts "scrutinize" what? Scrutinize the acts of the officers of Massachusetts and see that no crime is committed, no fraud perpetrated. Is not this the meaning of the section? and does it attempt anything more or authorize the supervisors to do anything else than guard and scrutinize an election provided for and proceeding under a State regulation?

Then it is provided in section 2016 that the supervisors shall attend at all times and places fixed for the registration of voters, when the names of registered voters may be marked for challenge. They may also on election day challenge voters. Challenge them under what law? Under the law of Massachusetts, of course. And when the registration is going on they have a right to be present to mark for challenge on the ballot-list; and they have a right to put their names upon the list so that it may be identified afterward. The nature of their duties is summed up in these words:

In such manner as will in their judgment detect and expose the improper or wrongful removal therefrom or addition thereto of any name.

In other words these gentlemen were to see that the State law was executed honestly, faithfully, fairly. This was to be the scope of their power at the election.

Section 2017 requires the supervisors to attend at all times and places for holding elections; and it has been maintained here that they are bound to stay by until the last legal act of the State is completed. But this clause certainly must refer to the proceedings at the polls and on election day. It says that they shall—

Personally inspect and scrutinize from time to time and at all times on the day of election.

My friends on the other side have undertaken to make this provision go further, and to say that the supervisors are bound to attend all the way through until everything provided for by the State law has been done.

Again, they are required to observe—

The manner in which the voting is done, and the way and method in which the poll-books, registry-lists, and tally or check books, whether the same are required by any law of the United States or of any State, territorial, or municipal law, are kept.

Now section 2019, the last to which I shall refer, goes on to state what shall be done. It declares that these officers shall—

Place themselves in such position in relation to the ballot-boxes for the purpose of engaging in the work of canvassing the ballots as will enable them to fully perform the duties in respect to such canvass provided herein, and shall there remain until every duty in respect to such canvass, certificates, returns, and statements has been wholly completed.

The law puts them at the ballot-box and then says they shall there remain until all the work has been completed.

Now, Mr. Speaker, may I not well claim that this law intends nothing more than that on the day of the election the officers appointed under the United States law shall be present to witness every act, to watch and scrutinize, to protect the rights of voters, and that when the sun goes down and the result of the election is declared by the proper officers the duty of the supervisors is completed? May I not assume that the Congress of the United States, in passing that law and guarding the ballot-box until the close of the election, felt itself safe in allowing the legally constituted authorities of the Commonwealth, the dangers of violence, ballot-stuffing, and frauds being passed, to complete the remaining duties, and figure out the general result, and make the final declaration?

Mr. Speaker, the recount was as carefully provided for by the State law as was the count at the polls. In Massachusetts the same system has existed and been practiced for several years, and before the United States law was passed. Congress has neither provided a substitute for it nor forbidden it and it ought therefore to be assumed that, the statute having only provided for an enforcement of the State law at the polls on the day of the election and to secure the means of punishing all violations of that law committed up to the close of election day, Congress intended to leave to the State to complete the work and find out the result. It will not do to assume that Congress intended more than it said; and it has not said, even by implication, that any act done in accordance with the State law should be void. It made no provision for any act to be done by the supervisors after the election was closed except to make a report to the chief supervisor of the district; and if any defect exists the defect is in the law of the United States appointing supervisors. Because the United States law stops in its execution, is it to be assumed the State law shall stop also? When an inspector is at the polls to watch the election and fails to do his duty, shall it be said the election shall stop? The election under the State law begins without waiting for a supervisor, and it does not stop when he leaves. Is the law of Massachusetts repealed? Is that the way to repeal provisions of the statute established under the mandate of the Constitution, designed to protect the ballot?

Is the State law repealed when the supervisor is faithfully watching and scrutinizing and not repealed when he neglects his duty or goes away? The State law is enforced and not repealed everywhere except where supervisors have been appointed, and where they have been appointed and do not do exactly what the law points out for them as their duty, they are as if they were not; and therefore it comes down to this: that the repeal of the State law is or is not, now is and now is not, as they are attentive or listless, watchful or neglectful. To appeal to the Constitution to shield such a repeal seems monstrous, not to say ridiculous and absurd.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I think I have conclusively shown the whole object of the law of the United States was to enforce and carry into complete execution every provision of the act of Massachusetts. To enforce the law is not the same as to repeal it, and the assumption of the committee is a mere assumption, if the committee hold that Massachusetts cannot complete her elections because the United States law does not provide for it.

The law of the State neither having been repealed nor modified by Congress and having in a lawful and orderly manner declared Mr. Field elected, we as candid and just men, deciding this case on the law and the evidence, can have no legal or just excuse for reversing the decree of the people, thus lawfully uttered. We have the power, Mr. Speaker, to set aside the decree of a State, thus lawfully made. We have the power to do wrong. This House is invested with the power to judge of the election and qualification of its own members. By a perversion of that power and by disregarding the voice of the people as legally ascertained we may elect the members of this House; but, sir, when that day comes that Union and that liberty of which we as a people are so apt to boast will have perished together.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, I have not been able to concur with the report of the majority of the committee in this case. I do not like, when I can avoid it, to differ with a committee of this House in the conclusions at which it arrives; and if this were upon a question of policy or a question of expediency, I might surrender my own judgment to that of the committee. But it is not upon a question of that kind; it is a question of law I am to pass upon as a sworn judge, and I am bound by every obligation that can tie the conscience of man to the Almighty who created him to render that sworn judgment according to my own convictions of the law, and not according to those of anybody else.

Mr. Speaker, I do not particularly desire to control the judgment of any other man, but I do desire to occupy the attention of this House for a short time, while I state, as briefly as I can, some of the reasons which compel me to vote against the conclusions of the majority of the committee.

By the Constitution of the United States in article 1, section 4, it is provided that—

The times, places and manner of holding elections for Senators and Representatives, shall be prescribed in each State by the Legislature thereof.

The times, places, and manner shall be prescribed in each State by the Legislature thereof—

Mr. SPRINGER. Read the rest of it.

Mr. WALSH. The rest of the paragraph states that Congress may alter such regulations, and I want to see whether it has done so or not. It says:

But the Congress may at any time by law make or alter such regulations, except as to the places of choosing Senators.

Now, sir, the Congress of the United States has made two laws upon this subject, and those are all: a law requiring the election for Representatives in Congress to be by districts and not at large, and a law requiring the elections of Representatives to be all held on the same day throughout the United States. To prescribe the times, the places, and the manner of holding the elections is, then, a sovereign right of the State of Massachusetts, and of every other State in this Union, except in regard to those two matters where Congress has come in with its paramount power and fixed and regulated them.

The great question in this case, and the only question in it, is whether the State of Massachusetts has the right to prescribe the mode and the manner of conducting her elections and of ascertaining the result by the processes which she has enacted into law upon her statute-book. That is the only question. The effort has been made here to get rid of this recount provided for under the laws of Massachusetts; in the first instance, upon a mere technicality that is not applicable to these proceedings, had among the people in regard to the result of elections, and that would not hold good in this case even in a court of record and of law; and, in the next place, by exaggerating and magnifying the authority of the United States supervisors appointed by a law passed, not under that provision of the Constitution, but under the provisions of the fifteenth amendment, to protect certain classes of voters at the polls. Well, sir, I cannot concur in either of those reasons for getting rid of the recount. The law of Massachusetts says—and I will quote the law in my printed remarks—that the voters have a right to petition within a certain number of days for a recount. The State of Massachusetts had a right to say that. It is a right that she had the absolute power to give to her voters if she chose, and she did give it to them. And the law of Massachusetts says that the first count, which is made upon the election day at the polls, shall go for nothing, shall determine nothing, and that no result shall be announced or declared from it until the number of days have elapsed within which the right is secured to the citizens to have a recount of the vote. The first count amounts to nothing until this time elapses; the whole process is incomplete. The whole election process is yet unfinished until that time elapses, and if within that time any ten citizens choose, or any greater number of citizens, as prescribed in the law, choose to petition for a recount, the aldermen are bound to examine the ballots.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. I desire at this point—

Mr. WALSH. I decline to be interrupted.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. I wish to correct my friend. I am sure he does not mean to misstate the law or to misrepresent the law of Massachusetts.

Mr. WALSH. I have declined to yield to the gentleman.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. I want to correct the gentleman in regard to the law. If the gentleman declines to be corrected—

Mr. WALSH. The gentleman can correct me to-morrow.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. I want to correct you while it is yet time, that you may be converted before you go too far into error. To-morrow will be too late.

Mr. WALSH. I read the gentleman's report, and if he could have corrected me on the law I would have found the correction there. And I cannot make any error in the law, because, as I have said, I will quote the law at length in my remarks in the RECORD, where the House can see it.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. But the House will not hear the gentleman's remarks, as he says he will set them out in the RECORD.

Mr. WALSH. What I say now will be set out, as I say it, in the RECORD, but the law will be set out as it is in the statute-book.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. I want you to give the law as it is in the statute-books to the House in your remarks now, and not leave it to be done in the RECORD afterward.

Mr. WALSH. I am giving it as it is in the statute-book. The law prohibits the declaration of the result until the time for the recount has passed. I repeat it again, and there is no mistaking of it. It says that these aldermen shall examine the ballots. Some gentleman said that did not mean a recount. Well, what does it mean? What do you mean by examining ballots? Do you mean by that looking at the color of the paper, whether they are printed in black ink or in red ink? What do you mean by ascertaining the result of an election, by examining the ballots, if it is not to find for whom the ballots are cast, whose names are on them, and how many they amount to when all are added together? But the fifth section of the law expressly says that there shall be a recount.

Extract from Election Laws of Massachusetts, act of 1874, chapter 376.

SEC. 40. In all elections in cities, whether the same shall be for United States, State, county, city, or ward officers, it shall be the duty of the warden or other presiding officer to cause all ballots which shall have been given in by the qualified voters of the ward in which such election has been held, and after the same shall have been sorted, counted, declared, and recorded, to be secured in an envelope, in open ward meeting, and sealed with a seal provided for the purpose; and the warden, clerk, and a majority of the inspectors of the ward shall indorse upon the envelope for what office and in what ward the ballots have been received, i. e. date of the election, and their certificate that all the ballots given in by the voters of the ward, and none other, are contained in said envelope.

SEC. 41. The warden, or the presiding officer, shall forthwith transmit the ballots, sealed as aforesaid, to the city clerk, by the constable in attendance at said election, or by one of the ward officers other than the clerk; and the clerk shall retain the custody of the seal, and deliver the same, together with records of the ward and other documents, to his successor in office.

SEC. 4. If within three days next following the day of any election, ten or more qualified voters of any ward shall file with the city clerk a statement in writing that they have reason to believe that the returns of the ward officers are erroneous, specifying wherein they deem them in error, said city clerk shall forthwith transmit such statement to the board of aldermen, or the committee thereof appointed to examine the returns of said election. The board of aldermen, or their committee, shall thereupon and within five days, Sunday excepted, next following the day of election, open the envelope and examine the ballots thrown in said ward, and determine the questions raised; they shall then again seal the envelope, either with the seal of the city or a seal provided for the purpose, and shall indorse upon said envelope a certificate that the same has been opened and again sealed by them in conformity to the law; and the envelope, sealed as aforesaid, shall be returned to the city clerk. Said city clerk, upon the certificate of the board of aldermen, or of their committee, shall alter and amend such of the ward returns as have been proved to be erroneous, and such amended returns shall stand as the true returns of the ward.

SEC. 5. The board of aldermen shall not declare the result of an election until the time specified in the preceding section for filing a request for a recount of ballots shall have expired, or in case of such request having been made, until the said ballots have been examined and the returns amended if found erroneous, any provision in the charter of any city or in any act in amendment thereof to the contrary notwithstanding.

Well, now, my friend from North Carolina, [Mr. SCALES,] whom I esteem highly, says, as other gentlemen say, that the law was not complied with in applying for the recount and that therefore the recount goes for nothing, because it is necessary to get the recount out of the way by an alleged defect in the petition or else by relying upon the absence of the United States supervisors. It is claimed that the application for a recount did not state sufficient to justify it.

My friend said that it did not state the reasons for a recount. Why, sir, pleadings do not state reasons, the courts do not try reasons. The pleadings state facts, not reasons; and it is facts upon which the courts determine rights. Now, what did the petition of these friends of Mr. Field for a recount say? I have here the petition, and they say:

To the CLERK City of Boston:

The undersigned, qualified voters of ward 13, in the third congressional district, hereby state that they have reason to believe that the returns of the ward officers of said ward for member of Congress in said congressional district, at the election of November 7, 1876, are erroneous.

Now, it does not stop there in specifying in what the returns were erroneous, but proceeds and points out the error "in that all the ballots cast for Walbridge A. Field as member of Congress were not counted and credited to him, and that more ballots were credited to Benjamin Dean as member of Congress than were cast for him; and they ask for a recount of the vote of said ward for member of Congress, in accordance with the provisions of section 4 of chapter 188 of the acts of the year 1876." (Signed by 15 voters of the ward.)

It states the reasons, the grounds, the facts on which the recount was asked, namely, that more ballots were cast for one candidate than were counted in his favor; and that a fewer number were cast for the other than were counted in his favor. Could anything be more definite than that? If that statement does not justify a recount under the law, then a recount never could be made, unless indeed you could get some one to watch the ballots as cast and specify the number of ballots supposed to be illegal.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. WALSH. I have declined to yield for the reason that I have not the physical constitution that will enable me to stand here much longer at this late hour in the afternoon.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. The gentleman says that nobody can know how many erroneous ballots were cast. If that be so, how can any one know that any erroneous ballots were cast?

Mr. WALSH. Suppose these gentlemen who petitioned for a recount had said that 9,000 votes had been illegally counted for one of the candidates; it would have been a mere guess upon their part. It would not have made any better case either before a court of law or before sensible men anywhere. They stated everything that could be stated according to the nature of the transaction, and that was all that they could be required to state in any place, namely, that there had been errors in the count by crediting one man with votes which he did not receive, and by not crediting another man with votes that he had received at the election of that day. That settles, I think, the point as to the jurisdiction for the recount.

The next thing is in regard to the supervisors. Now, no one in the United States, until it got into the heads of the committee, or of the gentleman who drew up this report of the majority, ever supposed that these supervisors of elections, who may be called into operation or may not be accordingly as a few men in particular districts desire, can overrule all the regulations of the State law, and take charge of the ballots, or that they may make the returns and ascertain the results, and that the governor, or the State officers who issue the certificate of election, had to act not upon the authority of the election officers appointed by the law of the State but upon what these supervisors said.

Now, the reading of the law shows that it does not mean anything of that kind. These supervisors are there to inspect the voting and to stay until the count is completed, and they have nothing to do with the return excepting to make it to some head supervisor.

Their count is not returned to the governor who issues the certificate, it is not returned to any State officers connected with the elections; and I say it is an absurdity to talk here before the lawyers of this House about its superseding anything which the State in her sovereign capacity under the Constitution of the United States has prescribed as to the mode of counting the ballots and ascertaining the result of an election.

Sir, that law covers everything. If you take it up you will find that it is a law to enforce the rights of citizens of the United States in elections. It relates to all elections, State elections, town elections, every little election held; it is not confined to any one class of elections under the terms of the law; but the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of Cruikshanks vs. The United States pretty well knocked the bottom out of that law. Whatever is left of it I do not know, but I know that it never was intended to interfere with the power of the States over elections for Representatives to Congress contained in the fourth section of article 1 of the Constitution of the United States.

Now, then, sir, there stands the law of Massachusetts regulating her elections, and the most careful law, the most particular, the most minute law; and that law was honestly and fairly executed in this case according to the concession of all parties; and when the law of Massachusetts has been executed what right have we in this House to trample down that law and say that this legal and constitutional mode which she has adopted for ascertaining the result of an election in her jurisdiction shall not prevail, but that the count by the little petty officers of wards, counts made in the hurry and excitement of an election, shall prevail, and that we will walk over the laws of that State providing for the ascertainment of the result of an election in a manner clearly within her constitutional power? Or else that these United States supervisors, who may be called in or may not be called in, shall be elevated to the grand importance of overruling all the laws and regulations of a State in connection with elections. I say that there is no authority in the law, no authority in the Constitution for any such proposition as that. I say that we, acting in this House, are not bound by any of their counts if there is anything to impeach or disturb them; we are bound by none of them. We have a right to get at the real truth of the matter.

But it is conceded in this case that there is nothing before us but the counts, and that we must take the one or the other of those counts. Whether we shall override the law of Massachusetts and give all significance to that count which was made in the primary stages of the election because it will yield a result that would be pleasant to us, and cast aside the final and revisory count that was in pursuance of the law of Massachusetts, that is the question for us to consider.

I do not think that any party ever gained in the long run by doing violence to law or to strict right. I believe that the masses of the American people are honest and intelligent. They hold parties to strict accountability when they come to understand that anything wrong has been done by them. I have never understood that the republican party in the long run reaped any particular advantage from any of the abuses that it committed upon the rights of the people and the rights of the States in the days when it had unlimited and absolute power in every part of the Union. I never knew that any party in the long run ever reaped any benefit from acts wrongfully committed, from violence done to right. And I thank God, Mr. Speaker, that the people of the United States are so intelligent, so honest, that they are able to sit in judgment upon parties and to bring them to the bar of accountability, and to cast them aside when they fail to discharge the high trust with which the people have commissioned them.

I have collected all the testimony in regard to these different counts, every important particle that is in the record relating to them. I call attention to that testimony in order that those who may take an interest in how I may vote will understand why it was that I could not sustain the report of the majority of the committee in this case.

COUNT OF WARD OFFICERS.

Fury, deputy United States marshal, ward 16, says, page 63:

Interrogatory 11. Were the ballots in ward 16 all carefully counted and the full number ascertained?

Answer. I think they were.

Cross-examination by William G. Russell, esq., of counsel for the incumbent:

Cross-interrogatory 1. By whom?

Answer. By the warden and the supervisors.

Cross-int. 2. By any one else?

A. I think not.

Cross-int. 3. Did not the clerk count them?

A. I did not see the clerk count them.

Cross-int. 4. Did you see the warden count them?

A. I did.

Cross-int. 5. All of them?

A. Not all of them.

Cross-int. 6. Did you not see the clerk count any of them?

A. No.

Cross-int. 7. Nor any of the inspectors?

A. None of the inspectors.

Leavitt, inspector, ward 15, democrat, says, page 44, he and one Smith counted the scratched tickets.

Patrick M. Denon, ward 16, inspector, democrat, says, page 58, fifteen cross-interrogatory, did not assist in counting the votes. Had charge of the ballot-box all day.

William H. Thomas, ward 18, inspector, democrat, says, page 76, his position was at one of the check-lists; "I had nothing to do with the counting."

Nicholas W. McGee, clerk of election, ward 13, says, page 163, he helped Mr. Hanscom count the great majority of the ballots.

C. B. Hunting, clerk, ward 16, says, page 166, counted the ballots as carefully as he could.

HOW THE UNITED STATES SUPERVISORS COUNTED.

William Swinson, United States supervisor, ward 18, republican, says, page 60:

Interrogatory 6. What ward officers counted the ballots for members of Congress?

Answer. The warden—I think only one person at a time, with the assistance of the clerk—they kept a very correct method, a regular debit and credit account, so that there was no chance for mistakes. One inspector also counted, and as they were counted they were passed to our table and we counted. The whole counting was done by two persons at a time; the others were attending at the boxes.

Page 61, Swinson says he was absent some time, but not at dinner. Daniel P. Sullivan, United States supervisor, ward 18, democrat, says, page 45:

Interrogatory 3. Will you describe as fully as you can the manner in which the votes cast in that ward for member of Congress on November 7, 1876, were counted by you and the other officers in that ward?

Answer. The system was the warden, clerk, and one of the inspectors did the counting. The warden and clerk were present at the counting of each lot taken out, and the inspector was absent when one lot was being counted. After they counted all the ballots for all the candidates on the tickets, they tied the ballots together; they had the republican ballots in one lot and the democratic in another and the prohibition in another, and they tied a string round each bundle, and marked on each bundle, on a ballot, the vote for Mr. Dean and for Mr. Field; then they were handed to the supervisors, Mr. Swinson and myself. Mr. Swinson would count the ballots and I would watch him, and after he got through he would hand them over to me and he would watch me counting. In some cases I counted them over two or three different times to see if the figures compared with the ward officers' count, and each time I found them to be correct.

Sullivan says Swinson was at dinner. Swinson was absent half hour to forty minutes: pages 46, 49.

Abraham J. Lamb, United States supervisor, ward 16, says, page 68, he was a democrat and Daly a republican; were United States supervisors; counted all the ballots. They put all they counted in the box, and no other.

John H. Daly, United States supervisor, ward 16, says, pages 69 and 70, he and Lamb counted all the ballots and put them in the box and saw them sealed. The warden and clerk counted them first. Their count always corresponded.

William H. Thomas, democratic inspector, ward 18, says, page 76:

Cross-interrogatory 3. Did the United States supervisors in your ward personally examine and count the votes for members of Congress?

Answer. I think not.

Cross-int. 4. Did neither of them count and scrutinize those ballots?

A. I didn't see either count a vote, they seemed to do the heavy standing round.

Cross-int. 5. Was not the last count of the ballots at the election of November 7, 1876, made just before depositing them in the boxes to be sent to the city hall?

A. The clerk and the warden keep a tally on the sheet of paper, and the warden and one of the inspectors, whom the warden details to assist in counting, keep the ballots so closely counted that in ten minutes after the polls are closed the vote can be declared.

Cross-int. 6. And were they never again counted in the ward meeting after the count you have thus described?

A. They were not; there was no necessity for it; they were all carefully counted and laid aside; tied up in bundles of a hundred.

Albert Thayer, clerk of ward 19, says, page 168:

Interrogatory 8. State whether said supervisors personally scrutinized, canvassed, and counted all the ballots for Representative to Congress cast in said ward at said election.

Answer. I should say not carefully scrutinized. Mr. Pickering personally counted every ballot, but I should say he didn't scrutinize it to find out just what names were on the ballots. Mr. Riley, I think, made no attempt in that line.

Cross-int. 3. Mr. Pickering examined the ballots carefully enough to see what names were on them for member of Congress, did he not?

A. I should think not. After I had counted the piles he merely took the piles and counted them to see how many there were in each pile, without scrutinizing them. As to Mr. Riley, if his intentions had been ever so good, I don't think he could have done anything; the space was so small there where the tables were that there wasn't room for anyone else to get in.

McGee, clerk, ward 13, says, page 163:

Interrogatory 7. State who acted as United States supervisors in said ward at said election.

Answer. J. J. McNamara and Frank Hanscom.

Int. 8. State whether said supervisors personally scrutinized, canvassed, and counted all the ballots for Representative to Congress, cast in said ward at said election.

A. I couldn't say they counted all of them; they helped count some of them; they supervised things generally and kept an eye on the boxes. Mr. Hanscom counted a great majority of them with myself. I overlooked all that he counted.

Goodwin, clerk, ward 14, says, page 163:

Interrogatory 8. State whether said supervisors personally scrutinized, canvassed, and counted all the ballots for Representative to Congress cast in said ward at said election.

Answer. They were very particular to do so. I think Mr. Reddy counted every ballot cast. I remember it very distinctly, because he was of different politics from me, and was very particular to have them carefully counted, especially for Representative to Congress.

Reddy was democratic United States inspector, and William S. Crosby the republican, at ward 14. In this ward they left out 25 votes for Mr. Dean and 11 for Field.

Alban S. Green, clerk, ward 15, says, page 164:

Interrogatory 7. State who acted as United States supervisors in said ward at said election.

Answer. I couldn't give their given names; there were two; one was a Mr. Osgood, I think; the other was McCarty. I work in the same room with him; have forgotten his first name.

Int. 8. State whether said supervisors personally scrutinized, canvassed, and counted all the ballots for Representative to Congress cast in said ward at said election.

A. They did personally scrutinize the counting, but did not count all the ballots; they did not scrutinize every ballot.

Kemp Kimball, clerk, ward 17, says, page 167:

Interrogatory 8. State whether said supervisors personally scrutinized, canvassed, and counted all the ballots for Representative to Congress cast in said ward at said election.

Answer. The supervisors sat by the table where they were being counted, within the rail, watching the counting as it proceeded, and, I think, in a few cases counting certain piles of ballots. The entire counting for all officers was done in their presence, and they had free access to all the proceedings. I do not think they counted all the ballots for Representative to Congress.

WHO M'CLEARY, CITY CLERK, IS.

Hugh O'Brien, democratic alderman, says, page 55:

Interrogatory 7. Did your committee take any evidence with regard to the challenged votes above referred to?

Answer. We took no evidence.

Int. 8. To what political party does Mr. Samuel F. McCleary, the city clerk, belong?

A. That's a question I couldn't answer. I think he is very indifferent about such matters. I never heard him express an opinion about those matters.

William H. Thomas, democratic inspector, ward 18, says, pages 75 and 76:

Interrogatory 14. According to common reputation in ward 18, to what political party in national politics does Mr. McCleary, the city clerk, belong?

Answer. He never makes much demonstration as a politician, but he has always been classed as a republican.

Cross-examination by William G. Russell, esq., of counsel for incumbent:

Cross-int. 1. Do you know for whom Mr. McCleary has voted at any presidential election, or what has been his vote for governor at any election?

A. No; I can't positively swear. I think the last time he voted he put his vote in a sealed envelope, in the city election.

Cross-int. 2. Has he not for twenty years and upward been elected to the present office by the voters of both parties?

A. He has.

THE SAFE WHERE M'CLEARY KEPT THE BALLOTS.

O'Brien says, page 153:

Cross-interrogatory 10. Please describe what sort of a safe it is, and where it is. Answer. It is on the lower floor of city hall, the basement, adjoining the office of the board of health; you enter it after opening two iron doors, but when you get inside it is a well-lighted apartment; there is a barred window which lights it up. I asked if it was entirely fire-proof and a good place to deposit records. The city clerk answered the question by saying it was immediately under the vault of the treasurer's office.

No one suspected they were tampered with. O'Brien says, page 157:

Interrogatory 36. Have you any suspicion, or reason for suspicion, that in the case of the election of November 7, 1876, the envelopes or ballots were in any way tampered with before they were recounted by your committee?

Answer. None whatever.

Int. 37. Did you ever hear a suggestion of any such suspicion?

A. Never.

It is agreed the boxes with the ballots were delivered to McCleary on election day, page 171:

It is agreed that these envelopes were duly transmitted from the several wards to the city clerk of said city, on the day of the election, November 7, 1876, sealed with the seals of the several wards, and bearing the certificates now appended thereto, copies whereof are hereto annexed, and that the several parties signing the said certificates were the ward officers, acting in the several capacities in which they appear by such certificates to have acted on the day of such election.

W. G. RUSSELL,
Of Counsel for Walbridge A. Field.
S. A. B. ABBOTT,
Of Counsel for Benjamin Dean.

HOW MCCLARY RECEIVED AND KEPT THE BALLOTS.

Mr. McClary says:

Interrogatory 2. How long have you held the office, and did you hold this office on the 7th of last November?

Answer. I have held the office for twenty-five years, and held it on 7th of November last.

Int. 3. Please state whether or not on that day the envelopes containing the ballots for member of Congress for the third congressional district were received by you at your office and from whom, and whether sealed or not, and what was done with them?

A. The said ballots were received by me on that day in sealed envelopes, as required by law, from the several constables appointed for the different wards, at my office. I then placed them in my safe and locked them up.

Int. 4. What were the seals upon the envelopes, and in what condition were they when received by you?

A. The seals were of wax, stamped with the seals of the several wards, and they were unbroken at the time of their reception in my office.

Int. 5. From what wards in this congressional district were they so received by you?

A. Wards Nos. 13, 14, 15, 16, 17, 18, 19, 20, 21, and 24.

Int. 7. Please state what certificates there were, if any, upon each of the boxes when they were received by you, as testified.

A. There were certificates on each of the boxes in the same form as the blank here produced and marked "W. W.—K.," and each certificate was signed by the warden, clerk, and a majority of the inspectors for the ward from which it came; differing only in the numbers of wards and districts, as indicated by the blanks in the form here produced. The original certificate is pasted upon each box here produced.

Int. 8. State whether or not the said envelopes, containing the ballots, were retained in your care; and, if so, where and in what condition and to what time.

A. They were; they continued locked up in my safe, under my care, with the seals unbroken, until examined by the committee of the board of aldermen (appointed for that purpose) in accordance with petitions presented for a recount of the votes for member of Congress for the third district. I have furnished a copy of the proceedings of the board of aldermen upon a recount of said votes to be annexed to the depositions in this case, and also of the petitions on which said proceedings were had.

Int. 9. Please state what took place as to the recount, so far as you know.

A. At the request of the committee, I delivered the envelopes containing the votes for Representative to Congress for the third congressional district to them for the purpose of a recount, and they opened the envelopes and counted the votes in an adjacent room, within five days of the election, and returned the boxes to me with a certificate upon each box, sealed with the seal of the city, and signed by the committee, setting forth that the boxes were opened for that purpose. I annex a copy of the certificate referred to. The certificates only varied in this respect, that some were dated November 10 and some November 11, according as the day on which the count was made varied. The certificates for wards 13 to 17 inclusive were dated November 10, and wards 18 to 24 inclusive November 11. (The copy referred to is marked "W. W.—L.")

HOW RECOUNT WAS MADE.

S. B. Stebbins, alderman, page 124:

Interrogatory 4. State what then took place; from whom the committee received the envelopes containing the ballots; in what condition these envelopes were when received by the committee, and what was then done by the committee in respect to a recount.

Answer. The first meeting of the committee was on Friday afternoon, November 10, in one of the committee rooms in the city hall. The committee received the envelopes containing the ballots from the city clerk; they were in proper form and order and sealed with the several ward seals, and the seals were unbroken. The committee were all present and commenced their labor with ward 13 first. The envelope was opened by the chairman of the committee, myself, in presence of the other members of the committee. The ballots were carefully taken from the envelopes and carefully placed upon the table, and were then first counted by the chairman of the committee for candidates for member of Congress from the third congressional district. Each member of the committee made a separate count and each member arrived at precisely the same result, and each member made a record of the result; the ballots were then resealed in the envelope. There was an application for a recount for member of the Legislature for that ward, I think, and, before sealing them, I think we made a recount of that vote also.

Redirect 15. Which count of ballots was made first, the count for member of Congress from the third district or the count for State officers, referred to in your cross-examination as being made about the same time?

Answer. The count for member of Congress was made first by the committee, and at the conclusion of their count the count was made to verify the election for State officers; it was the same in each ward.

Int. 23. In the cases which you have referred to, where a count was made by Messrs. Priest, Lee, and Clapp of the votes for members of the State Legislature, while the boxes were open for the purposes of counting the ballots for member of Congress from the third district, which count was made first, that by the committee of ballots for member of Congress, or that which was made by the assistants for members of the Legislature? State the whole course of proceeding.

A. I think I have already stated the envelopes containing the ballots cast for member of Congress for the third congressional district was, in every instance, opened and counted by the committee before the count was made for members of the Legislature.

Alderman Viles, page 135:

Interrogatory 7. What seals, if any, were upon the envelopes when they were so brought in, and in what condition were the seals?

Answer. The city seal was upon them and always whole.

Int. 15. Was this recount for State officers in wards 13 and 14 made before or after the recount made by the committee of the board of aldermen for member of Congress for the third district?

A. Made after.

O'Brien, democratic alderman, page 151:

Interrogatory 12. What seals, if any, were upon the envelopes when you received them, and in what condition were the seals?

Answer. The seals of the ward officers and the condition of them were perfect. One seal was a little out of place, broken little by moving the boxes round, not broken so as to indicate opening. I don't know whether that was at this count or the others.

Int. 13. How did the committee proceed to count? State fully and particularly all that was done.

A. After breaking the seal, we generally put as many ballots together of one kind as we could conveniently get at, and then counted in piles of twenty-five each. Alderman Stebbins commenced the count, followed by Viles, and then by myself, and each member of the committee made their count agree. Each member of the committee counted every vote separately, not relying upon each other. If the democratic votes came up first in the box we took those out and counted them, and then took the others out.

Int. 14. Whether you counted the ballots contained in each envelope severally before beginning on any other?

A. We counted the ballots in each box separately, and before commencing on any other that box was sealed up and put away. Before we sealed up the box we made a record of the ballots in it, and the count of all three agreed before we sealed it.

Int. 18. Whether or not this recount of ballots for State officers was made before or after the same ballots had been counted by you for member of Congress and the recount recorded by you?

A. Made after.

NO STICKERS FELL OFF.

Stebbins says, page 133:

Interrogatory 22. Whether or not you are familiar with what are known as pasters or stickers, and whether your committee carefully examined the boxes to see if there were any such detached from the ballots, and the result of such examination?

Answer. I am familiar with them; they are names of candidates printed upon paper prepared with gluten, to paste over other names upon election ballots. Great care was exercised by the committee, and no pasters for candidates for Congress were found detached from the ballots.

Viles says, page 137:

Interrogatory 25. Did you look to see whether there were any pasters or stickers in the envelopes separated or detached from the envelopes?

Answer. I did in every instance, in every box, and also on the floor where Mr. Stebbins sat. Stebbins was chairman, and no one ever took any ballots out of the envelopes, except Stebbins.

Int. 26. Did you find any such stickers or pasters remaining in the envelopes or upon the floor or the table?

A. I did not.

O'Brien says, page 151:

Interrogatory 16. Did you satisfy yourself that you counted all the ballots, and did you look to see whether there were any stickers or pasters in the boxes?

Answer. I am satisfied that I counted every ballot. I don't remember that any pasters or stickers were in the boxes for Mr. Field or Mr. Dean. I always looked to see.

I will briefly allude to that testimony. It shows that at this election, when the ballots had been counted at the ward precincts, they were put into a package, or envelope, or box, which was sealed up with a seal, and that seal was kept in the pocket of the ward clerk. A paper indorsed by the inspectors of elections of the ward was then pasted upon the box and those boxes were taken to the city hall and there placed in a vault. Under the law the constables are directed to take the boxes to the city hall. The election was over about four o'clock in the day, and the counting was completed about half an hour later. Then, in the broad, open day-light, these ten ward constables of the ten wards of Boston constituting this congressional district carried the boxes through the streets of Boston to the city hall, the boxes thus sealed and indorsed, upon the evening of Tuesday, November 7, 1876.

The constables delivered those boxes into the custody of the city clerk. According to the record these boxes were so delivered to the proper officer, who put them into the vault upon that Tuesday evening, and there they remained until Friday morning, when this recount began. But two days intervened—Wednesday and Thursday—from the time the boxes were put into the vault until the time when this recount began. One of the witnesses, Mr. McCleary, swears that that vault was locked; that the key was kept in his pocket; that the vault was not open during that time; that no one went into it until the boxes were taken out by himself on the Friday morning for the recount.

Mr. McCleary, according to the record, is an old gentleman, who has been clerk of the city of Boston for over twenty-five years, unchanged and undisturbed amid all the convulsions of parties, personal animosities, and everything of that kind. According to the testimony he is a man who was so pure and free from political bias that none of the witnesses knew what were his politics.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. They say that he voted the republican ticket.

Mr. WALSH. Well, he had a right to do that.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. I do not deny it.

Mr. WALSH. And a republican may be honest.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. I do not deny that either. But you said nobody knew what were his politics.

Mr. WALSH. Upon this Friday morning these boxes were brought out one by one, not all at a time. It is proved that the seals on them were unbroken, that the indorsements upon them were unchanged. Each ward box was opened and the ballots in that box were counted before any other box was opened. The boxes were taken out of the vault one at a time, and only the votes for member of Congress were counted; not the whole twenty-seven or thirty names which were on the ballots.

That count was made by three aldermen, and of those three aldermen two were democrats. They made this recount, they swear that they made it carefully, that they made it correctly, that they counted all the ballots in the boxes, and that the result which they have given you is what was the result of those ballots in the boxes.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. Did not those three men give the plurality—

Mr. WALSH. I cannot yield to the gentleman now; he will have his time to-morrow.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. Did not those three men give the plurality to Dean?

Mr. WALSH. I have no time to be interrupted.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. Did they not give it to Dean?

Mr. WALSH. No; those three men did not give the majority to Dean?

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. The plurality.

Mr. WALSH. The contest was whether 25 ballots for Field, with the designation of another congressional district, should be counted for him or not. That was all the contest upon which commenced this whole proceeding now before us here. It is only since the case has come here that this new ground has been taken.

The whole contest there was whether those 25 votes for Mr. Field, giving a wrong designation of the district, should be counted for him or not. These three aldermen, appointed by the democratic mayor of the city of Boston, two of them democrats, swear that the recount was correctly made; that it brings out the result of the ballots which were put in the boxes, and all the testimony shows that the boxes were not tampered with; that no ballots were changed, none put in and none taken out. Where, then, I ask, is there ground for any man to stand upon and say that we shall overthrow the law of Massachusetts and unseat a member who has his certificate like all the rest of us, upon testimony that does not impugn the final count upon which he received that certificate, except by setting up the preliminary count to which the law of Massachusetts does not intrust the ascertainment of the result? Any one who will look at the table of the result of the recount (which I publish with my remarks) will see that there was no tampering with the ballot-boxes. Mr. Dean gains two or three votes in one ward and loses two or three in another, and the case is the same with Mr. Field. Mr. Dean actually gains 25 votes by the recount in ward 16. Now, if any one were tampering with the ballot-boxes he would not do it by making these little changes and going all through the different wards. The ballot-box stuffer would not break open all the boxes, but would put in or take out enough ballots in one of the boxes to give his friend the election. But in this case we have only little fragments of difference, the result of the little errors and accidents that would necessarily happen in the making of the first count. I believe there are very few elections where the first count is absolutely correct, though in general the majority for one party or the other is so large that a recount would be unimportant. But I never yet knew of a recount anywhere where the result was exactly the same as on the first count, because on the recount there is more time to make the computation accurate; the officers are freer from excitement and their attention is not diverted by loud and angry conversation and by hurrahing by the different parties, and all the other things that disturb them on the day of the election. A recount rarely or never corresponds exactly with the original count; and the only reason why a recount is not oftener made is because the majority is generally so large that a recount would not affect the result in any way. Where all possibility of tampering with the ballots is excluded by the testimony, as in this case, we may very safely determine the result by the recount.

Somebody has given great importance to the fact that one vote for a man named Smith was not found in the box on the recount, although it is given in the return of the ward officers. Well, sir, this is a very small feather to overturn the official count made under the laws of Massachusetts, and sworn to as correct by the men who made it, two of them men of my own party. Why, sir, that vote for Smith was not visible to the eyes of the United States supervisors; it does not appear in their count at all. They did not return it because they did not see it.

Mr. SPRINGER. They returned no scattering votes.

Mr. WALSH. I know that they returned no scattering votes; but their papers or returns do not state that they found such votes and did not return them. They are sworn according to law to see that every man gets the votes that are cast for him. Why did they not see that this man Smith received that one vote cast for him for member of Congress? If there was a vote cast for Smith, and if the ward officers saw it, it did not get into the box; for the United States supervisors did not see it, and the three aldermen did not see it. How can the grand sum total of the result of this election be affected by a little question like that, whether one vote for a third party was in the ballot-box or not?

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. There was only a difference of 4 votes either way.

Mr. WALSH. Well, this vote for Smith could not go to either of these parties. Smith is not here complaining. The question as to his vote is brought in only because "drowning men catch at straws." When in the trial of a great cause you find men hanging around the outskirts of the great central question for scraps of irrelevant matter it shows, in my view, that they lack weightier matters reaching to the merits to dwell upon.

Now, it has been said that there were "stickers" or "pasters" upon some tickets with Mr. Dean's name on, and that on the recount these may have fallen off. Well, of course, anything may have happened provided it is not a natural impossibility. But the merits of causes like this are not determined by guesses and conjectures. Unfortunately, however, for this wild conjecture, the witnesses all swear—the three aldermen, the city clerk, and everybody who was present—that at the recount "pasters" or "stickers" were carefully looked for, that none were found in the boxes and none fell upon the floor. That disposes of the question as to "stickers."

I have looked at this case carefully and conscientiously, with no desire, of course, to reach a conclusion against my own party friend. I do not profess to be free from party bias. I am a democrat, have always belonged to the democratic party, and always hope to belong to it. I believe it to be the grandest political party that was ever known in the history of the world.

I cannot read the history of the United States without seeing that the democratic party sat at its cradle, and that it was to its statesmanship, its watchfulness, its fidelity to the trust of human liberties committed to it, that the Republic is indebted for the grand and glorious position it now occupies. Sir, I would not do anything to injure the democratic party, but, on the contrary, I would do all I could in honor and in truth to sustain it, to elevate it, and restore it again to the control of the Government. But gentlemen who do not see very far sometimes make great mistakes. They think in their day and generation they are accomplishing a great deal, but it is the man who looks to the outcome of the more distant future who, in my judgment, is to be considered the wisest. However that may be, I shall vote to retain the sitting member in his seat, not certainly from any party predilection for him, but because I honestly believe, under the law and facts which govern me in this case, he is entitled to the seat.

No. 2371) to amend an act entitled "An act for the support of the government for the District of Columbia for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1878, and for other purposes," returned from the Senate with amendments. This bill relates to the new assessment for the District of Columbia, which was passed by the House some time ago, but has been delayed to the present time in the Senate. The amendments of the Senate merely strike out "July" where it occurs and inserts "August." It is important the bill should pass at once, and I hope there will be no objection to concurring in the Senate amendments.

There was no objection, and the amendments of the Senate were concurred in.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Michigan, moved to reconsider the vote by which the Senate amendments were concurred in; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

JOHN RAY AND WILLIAM L. McMILLEN.

Mr. HOAR. I move to take up the resolution of the Senate for the payment of John Ray and William L. McMillen.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to consider the following resolution submitted by Mr. KELLOGG, January 15:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate be, and he is hereby, directed to pay out of the contingent fund of the Senate full compensation and mileage as Senators to John Ray and William L. McMillen for the unexpired term of WILLIAM P. KELLOGG in the Forty-second Congress.

The resolution was reported from the Committee on Privileges and Elections with an amendment to strike out all after the words "contingent fund of the Senate" and insert "the sum of $1,000 each to John Ray and William L. McMillen, as full compensation for their expenses as contestants for a seat in the Senate for the unexpired term of WILLIAM P. KELLOGG in 1873;" so as to read:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate be, and he is hereby, directed to pay out of the contingent fund of the Senate the sum of $1,000 each to John Ray and William L. McMillen, as full compensation for their expenses as contestants for a seat in the Senate for the unexpired term of WILLIAM P. KELLOGG in 1873.

Mr. HOAR. If the Senate will listen to a statement which will take about a minute, I think there will be no opposition to the resolution, and that it will save the necessity of reading the report; but if any Senator calls for the reading of the report, it can be read. The facts of the case are these: upon the resignation of Governor KELLOGG as Senator from Louisiana on the 13th of January, 1873, there were two rival bodies then claiming to be the State Legislature of Louisiana; one of them elected Mr. Ray and the other elected Mr. McMillen; and these gentlemen appeared and applied for the seat severally. The committee before whom they appeared, after a long investigation, occupying more than a month, reported that there was no State government in Louisiana. That resolve was rejected by the Senate, and the Senate adjourned without taking any action upon the claim of these two rival claimants to the seat.

The rival claimants appeared as counsel before the committee and conducted, with other gentlemen, an examination into the entire history of the election in Louisiana, the entire question between the two rival State governments, and all the great public questions with which the Senate are familiar, which grew out of that matter. But their claim to the seat was never determined by the Senate. The Committee on Privileges and Elections are agreed that the contest was a fit contest for each party to make, and that it was proper that their claim should be presented to the Senate. The unbroken usage in such cases of the Senate has been to allow contestants under such circumstances the full salary and mileage, which in this case would amount to about $2,700. On making their application the then committee in 1873 reported that that was a vicious practice, and submitted a resolution that these gentlemen be allowed their actual expenses and no more. That resolution was not acted upon at all by the Senate. It was reported some eighteen months after the contest. Afterward the Senate went back in other cases to the old practice, and in the Alabama case of Mr. Sykes allowed the full salary and mileage, amounting to a very large sum. The Committee on Privileges and Elections in the present case are unanimously agreed not to follow that precedent, but to limit these gentlemen in the present case to their actual expenses and disbursements. But the committee thought, as the rule of the Senate had been otherwise and these gentlemen had no notice whatever of a rule which would have required them to preserve vouchers and minute specific accounts of all their expenses, that it was not reasonable to require of them at this distance of time such vouchers, which they say they did not preserve and are unable to furnish; and we reported that the sum of a thousand dollars apiece was a reasonable and moderate estimate of their actual charges and expenses under the circumstances.

They traveled here from Louisiana; they performed a service which they would have been warranted in employing distinguished counsel to perform and charging it to the contingent fund of the Senate if their expenses and disbursements were to be allowed. One of them was an eminent lawyer, Mr. Ray, the republican claimant, who laid aside his professional business and was attendant here for a month, and the other gentleman, Mr. McMillen, though I believe not a lawyer, is an eminent and able man who rendered important service in the investigation not only of his claim to a seat, but in the general investigation in which the Senate and the committee were engaged.

Under these circumstances the Committee on Privileges and Elections are unanimous in the belief that a reasonable disposition of the question is to allow them a thousand dollars apiece.

Mr. BAYARD. I do not propose to make opposition to the action of the committee who have no doubt intelligently and carefully considered this case, or to oppose my discretion of the allowance to these parties to theirs. I very well remember the tangled skein of politics that came to us from Louisiana. It seems to me that after the credentials of Mr. McMillen were before the Senate and the presence of those credentials was urged as a cause of rejection of the credentials of Pinchback who came here claiming his place, Mr. McMillen had placed himself so in the hands of a Senator then upon the floor from Louisiana, Mr. West, that he felt authorized to rise and withdraw Mr. McMillen's credentials in order to make way for Mr. Pinchback.

Mr. HOAR. Will the Senator from Delaware permit me to say that that related to another and a different term. This contest was in relation to the unexpired term of the then Senator KELLOGG, who afterward became governor of the State.

Mr. BAYARD. I do not wish to oppose myself to any fact found by the Committee on Privileges and Elections in this case, but to state that which arises to my mind, that at the time Mr. McMillen's credentials were withdrawn the idea prevailed, I cannot say precisely upon what proof, that there had been an accommodation of these rival claims which had resulted in such compensation to Mr. McMillen for his withdrawal of his papers as would have made the present reimbursement for his expenses superfluous. I do not know the fact. I remember this was stated at the time; and I remember that Mr. McMillen's claims were in the hands of a gentleman entirely opposed to himself here in politics, so that he apparently could withdraw them at his will, and he did so, and the idea here, as in another branch of Congress, was that the contestants had settled the matter among themselves and that the one receiving his pay had paid a due proportion of it over to the other. Mr. Pinchback's claim I think was the modest sum of sixteen or eighteen thousand dollars, which was paid to him when he never had sat in this body one hour or rendered one farthing of service, but on the contrary a good deal on the other side to the people of this country.

I do not wish to oppose the discretion of a committee who are composed of intelligent members of this body, but I must confess that I regret that their discretion has tended to believe that there should be compensation in this case.

Mr. HOAR. I repeat that the information as to facts, which the Senator from Delaware has, relates to a wholly different term. Of course, the committee have not investigated, and could not investigate, any such matter; but in regard to this term, the then Committee on Privileges and Elections, I believe without any dissent, reported eighteen months after the occurrence that these contestants were entitled to be paid their charges and expenses. There was no dissent then, as far as I am aware, from that report, except by those who thought they ought to be paid, under the usage of the Senate, the full salary and mileage. The only difference between the present report and that is, that while we limit them to the smaller sum, we think, under the peculiar circumstances, it is not just to require of them vouchers as to every detail, but have made an estimate.

Mr. GARLAND. I call for the reading of the report.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Arkansas calls for the reading of the report of the committee.

Mr. JOHNSTON. I should like to ask the Senator from Massachusetts whether Mr. McMillen was not elected twice, for two different terms?

Mr. HOAR. The legislatures, as I understand, the rival bodies, undertook to elect Ray and McMillen for the unexpired term of Mr. KELLOGG. Then they undertook to elect severally McMillen and Pinchback for the following full term, which began on March 4, 1873. This report relates wholly to the contest for the unexpired term.

Mr. COCKRELL. Are the claims for the other terms before the committee?

Mr. HOAR. They were disposed of by the Senate; and, if I am not mistaken, the Senate proceeded on the old and more liberal theory of giving the claimant, though they denied him the seat, full salary and mileage, which amounted, as the Senator from Delaware says, to the sum of $16,000 or $17,000.

Mr. MERRIMON. Over $18,000.

Mr. GARLAND. The report is not long. Let us have the report read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the report.

The Chief Clerk read the following report, submitted by Mr. HOAR on the 22d instant:

The Committee on Privileges and Elections, to whom was referred Senate resolution to pay John Ray and William L. McMillen compensation and mileage, report as follows:

The full term of WILLIAM P. KELLOGG, Senator from Louisiana, expired March 3, 1873. He resigned January 13, 1873.

At the last-named date there were two bodies in Louisiana claiming to be the legal Legislature of that State. One of these bodies elected John Ray to fill the unexpired term; the other elected William L. McMillen. Their respective credentials in due form were presented to the Senate on the 22d day of January, 1873. Those of John Ray were certified to by WILLIAM P. KELLOGG, governor; those of William L. McMillen were certified to by JOHN MCENERY. Both sets of credentials were, on the day of their presentation to the Senate, referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

On the 20th of February, 1873, the Committee on Privileges and Elections reported—

1. That there is no State government at present existing in the State of Louisiana.

2. That neither John Ray nor W. L. McMillen is entitled to a seat in the Senate, neither having been elected by the Legislature of the State of Louisiana.

The first proposition was submitted by the committee to the Senate by virtue of a resolution passed January 16, 1873, in the following terms:

"Resolved, That the Committee on Privileges and Elections be instructed to inquire and report to the Senate whether there is a legal State government in Louisiana, and how and by whom it was constituted."

As part of the committee's report of February 20, 1873, a bill was submitted ordering an election in Louisiana. This measure was considered at great length by the Senate, and was rejected February 27, 1873. A motion to reconsider was laid on the table March 1, 1873.

No decision was ever made by the Senate of the question whether there was or was not, at the time specified, a legal State government in Louisiana, but the Senate rejected the bill ordering a new election to be held in Louisiana.

The second proposition submitted by the committee, that neither Ray nor McMillen was entitled to a seat in the Senate, was never acted upon by the Senate, as the term for which they claimed to be elected expired without the question having been considered.

Throughout the investigation made by the Committee on Privileges and Elections, by order of the Senate, of the affairs of the State of Louisiana, both Ray and McMillen were in constant attendance, aiding the committee by their knowledge of the case and by their testimony in the discharge of the duty imposed upon it.

In the Forty-third Congress a resolution that Ray and McMillen be paid as Senators for the unexpired term to which they were elected was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate. Mr. Carpenter, of Wisconsin, who made the report on the Louisiana case from the Committee on Privileges and Elections, was chairman of the Committee on Contingent Expenses. He submitted the following report upon the resolution giving compensation:

"Owing to the fact that in the State of Louisiana, in 1872 and 1873, there were two bodies claiming to be the Legislature of that State, one known as the McEnery and the other as the Kellogg legislature, John Ray and William L. McMillen each claimed the seat made vacant in the Senate by the resignation of Hon. WILLIAM P. KELLOGG, and appeared and presented their credentials to the Senate, and attended before the Committee on Privileges and Elections, charged with the investigation of their claims. The committee reported against seating either of them, but both had incurred expenses in the prosecution of their claims.

"By analogy to the precedents of the Senate, your committee are of opinion that both Ray and McMillen would be entitled to the salary of a Senator from the time of their election until the disposition of their claims respectively by the Senate; but regarding this precedent as vicious, your committee recommend the adoption of the following resolution:

"Resolved, That the actual expenses necessarily incurred by John Ray and William L. McMillen, claimants to a seat in the Senate from the State of Louisiana, in the Forty-second Congress, in presenting their respective claims to a seat in the Senate, be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate; which expenses shall be presented itemized and verified by the oath of the said Ray and McMillen respectively, and the amounts shall be audited by the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate."

No action was ever had by the Senate upon this recommendation: it was not made until eighteen months after the respective credentials were presented. The claimants to the seat could not have been expected to preserve an account of items of their expenditure, nor could they have anticipated that a proposition would be submitted so entirely at variance with the idea of compensation attending Senatorial service, and so contrary to the uniform practice of the Senate.

The chairman of the Committee on Contingent Expenses of the Forty-third Congress was entirely familiar with the claims of Ray and McMillen. He made the report from that committee that they were entitled to compensation, but he proposed an innovation upon the precedents of the Senate in the manner of that compensation. The proposition to change the usages of the Senate did not meet with favor, and by the action had upon the cases of Mr. Pinchback, of Louisiana, and of Mr. Sykes, of Alabama, occurring and passed upon subsequently, the Senate confirmed its uninterrupted usage. In acting upon the two last-cited cases the Senate stipulated, "That in no case shall any pay be allowed to a Senator to begin earlier than the date of his election or appointment."

Upon the foregoing facts we are of opinion that each of the contestants was justified in making the contest for the seat. If the usage of the Senate in such cases be followed, each should be allowed the sum of $1,334.67, being the amount of compensation and mileage from the date of his alleged election to the end of the term. But we do not recommend such an allowance, but prefer to allow to each claimant only his actual and reasonable expenses incurred in making the contest. Under the circumstances, however, it would be clearly unjust to refuse to the claimants an itemized account of such expenses. They allege that they kept no such account, relying on the unbroken usage of the Senate to allow salary and not compensation, and that they cannot now furnish either items or vouchers. It appears, however, that each of these gentlemen traveled from New Orleans to Washington, remained here more than a month, laying aside all other business, and wholly devoting himself to this contest. The question required an elaborate and thorough examination of the history of the Louisiana election and the claims of the rival State governments. In this examination the contestants acted as counsel, and rendered a service in which, if they had employed other suitable counsel, they might properly pay a large fee, which should be reimbursed by the Senate.

On the whole, we recommend the payment to each of the sum of $1,000, which is considerably less than the salary and mileage, and is a moderate estimate of the actual cost and expense incurred by each.

We therefore recommend that the resolution be amended by substituting therefor the following, and that, so amended, the same be adopted: Strike out all after the words "contingent fund of the Senate," and insert "the sum of $1,000 each to John Ray and William L. McMillen, as full compensation for their expenses as contestants for a seat in the Senate for the unexpired term of WILLIAM P. KELLOGG in 1873."

Mr. SAULSBURY. Mr. President, as a member of the Committee on Privileges and Elections, if I had not felt bound by the precedent in other cases I should not have voted for this resolution; but under all the circumstances I thought the compensation of $1,000 proposed to each contestant was proper, controlled as our action was necessarily controlled to some extent by the precedents which had taken place in this body with reference to other contestants. I gave my assent to it on that ground. We all know that when that contest was made these gentlemen were here, that they were taking part in that examination for some six weeks perhaps or longer, each one of them claiming that he was entitled to a seat in the Senate of the United States. I do not say now that either of them ought to have been here, but they were here making a contest and necessarily incurred expenses in that investigation; and the unbroken precedent of the Senate heretofore has been to allow contestants some compensation. This is the smallest that has ever been allowed to any. If we had no precedents to control our action I would vote against this resolution, but I cannot do it in justice to these men without at once saying that I will pursue that course in reference to all contestants hereafter.

When that contest was made some of us said that Mr. McMillen was entitled to a seat on the floor of the Senate and others said that Mr. Ray was entitled to it. There was a division of opinion in the body. I know that at that time a number of gentlemen with whom I acted believed that Mr. McMillen was entitled to a seat on this floor; other gentlemen on the other side of the Senate as conscientiously believed that Mr. Ray was entitled, but neither of them took the seat, and by the lapse of time the question was disposed of. The contest was, however, made, and on that ground I give my vote, because there are precedents that control our action in cases of this kind.

Mr. GARLAND. I ask the Senator from Delaware if this was a unanimous report?

Mr. SAULSBURY. There was no objection made to the compensation of $1,000.

Mr. GARLAND. Was there no minority report?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair understands the report to be a unanimous report of the committee. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

Mr. COCKRELL. I think in this time of civil-service reform it would be exceedingly opportune to stop these bad precedents in the Senate by which so many Senators say they are bound. Now, I am opposed to this resolution. I am opposed to paying any contestant for a seat upon this floor either a salary or expenses; and I hope there will be enough of the Senators join me in this opposition at least to call for the yeas and nays on the passage of the resolution.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment reported by the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

The amendment was agreed to, yeas 37, noes not counted.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Will the Senate agree to the resolution as amended?

Mr. COCKRELL. Now I hope the yeas and nays will be given us on the passage of the resolution.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. WADLEIGH. I wish, Mr. President, before the vote is taken, to say a single word upon the question before the Senate. At the time these two contestants came here claiming a seat there was a long struggle between them and much division in the minds of the Senate as to whether either of them was entitled to a seat here. Many Senators believed that the one was entitled to the seat and many that the other was entitled. It was never decided by the Senate that neither of these gentlemen was entitled to the seat. The lapse of time deprived the question of importance. The period for which they had been elected had elapsed, and consequently there never was any decision by the Senate that either of the gentlemen was entitled to the seat. They rendered to the Senate important service in the investigation of the question before the Senate. They came here and performed that service; they assisted the Senate in coming to a judgment upon the question, to which, however, it never actually came; and in view of all the precedents and as a matter of justice, considering the doubt there was as to which was entitled or whether either was entitled, the Committee on Privileges and Elections believed it just and right that this allowance should be made and they unanimously reported in favor of it.

I trust, Mr. President, that the resolution reported by the committee will be adopted.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. May I ask the Senator a question? Was McMillen paid for any previous contest to the one now being paid for? In other words, has McMillen received any money at any time from the Senate or from Congress in any form or manner from either House other than this?

Mr. WADLEIGH. I do not understand that he has. I have never heard that he has and I have no information that would lead me to believe that he has.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I would ask the Senator from Massachusetts who has charge of the resolution whether he knows.

Mr. HOAR. I understand not. I am not sure, but I think I cannot be mistaken when I say that neither of them has ever received any compensation whatever for any previous contest and that neither of them has received any for any subsequent contest; that is, for the contest to which the Senator from Delaware [Mr. BAYARD] alluded, for the full term where McMillen's claims are said by him to have been withdrawn, there was no compensation paid.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. My question related to any term.

Mr. HOAR. I understand it; I meant to cover that question fully. I have heard of no such thing, and I do not believe that any such thing has ever happened.

Mr. CONKLING. The order of the yeas and nays upon this resolution induces me very briefly to give the reason for my vote. It has long seemed to me that the usage in each House was an abuse. That usage has been, regardless of the merit of the particular party, whether the contestant or the person seated, to give to both equally the entire compensation and mileage intended by the law to be attached to the office and not to unentitled claimants of the office. I have endeavored heretofore to vote so as to indicate my dissent from that usage. Now I hear the honorable Senator from Missouri [Mr. COCKRELL] say that he will vote against this resolution for a reason which it seems to me goes much too far. I understand the honorable Senator to say that he would vote no compensation and no expenses to any one who unsuccessfully claims a seat in the Senate. I submit to my honorable friend that that will hardly do. If I as a private litigant come into court claiming money or rights of him, and I am defeated, it is not unnatural, and it is usual, that I should pay the costs of that attempt; but if he, or I, appear before the Senate to uphold the claim of a State, to insist that by the voice and behest of a State a seat belonging to that State in the Senate should be awarded to one of us, it can hardly be said that we are mere private claimants conducting a personal and individual venture of our own the results of which should fall wholly on us.

If I be right in this, I doubt if a case has occurred which more clearly falls within the principle I seek to indicate. Here was not a personal question. The Constitution says that the Senate "shall be the judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its own members." There was no question of qualification here; there was no personal question of election; but the question concerned the existence of a State, the statehood of a State, or to borrow Mr. Lincoln's phrase, the question was largely whether this State was in proper practical relations with the Union so that its voice might be uttered here. Surely that is not a question which can be likened to a mere personal claim moved by personal and individual interests of the party who makes it or in whose name it is made.

Now the committee, as it seems to me with much discernment and circumspection, state in the first place that these parties were well warranted in pursuing this contest. That is a mode of stating that it was the duty of each of them to pursue it; it is a statement of good faith. Further the committee say that they relied on the usage—which I believe they do not call immemorial but they might have so called it—under which mileage and compensation was the measure of rendition in any event, and relying upon that they did not keep an exact account and preserve vouchers so as to be able to state exactly their disbursements; and the committee arriving at that as nearly as they have been able to do say, "No, we will not pay mileage and compensation," which I see according to the report would amount to $1,334.67, "but we will pay $1,000, which amount we find on the facts before us to be as nearly as we can state it the actual disbursements and expenses of the parties."

Mr. President, I do not see how any Senator, even if he feels as I have felt, for one, heretofore about this practice—and I suppose that my judgment has been as adverse to it as that of almost any Senator—I do not see how any Senator looking at this case can say, unless he disputes the accuracy of the finding on the question of amount, that the actual expenses of those concerned in a contest so important, so unusual in its character as this, should not be paid. I need not remind the Senate that so close was the question that the very smallest of majorities determined it, and that the different sides of this controversy were espoused by equal numbers and perhaps by equal weight of judgment and character in the Senate, as near as equality could exist with any ultimate preponderance.

Mr. THURMAN. I am like the Senator from New York in saying that the call for the yeas and nays compels me to say a word in explanation of the vote I shall give.

Long ago the Senate inaugurated a practice which I am free to confess ought to be abolished unless under very peculiar circumstances, and which I am glad to see the report of the committee in this case in effect disregards, of paying compensation and mileage to unsuccessful contestants for seats on this floor. The number of cases in which that has been done is much more numerous than any Senator would suppose who has not looked into the question. They were brought before the attention of the Senate, very notably in the case of Pinchback, by the chairman of the Committee on Privileges and Elections, the late Senator from Indiana; and that rule obtained to such an extent that it was very seldom, if ever, that such a claim was rejected. In Pinchback's case the Senate went further. The principle on which the Senate had gone before was that if a man was elected or apparently elected to the Senate by the Legislature of a State, it was his duty to present his claim to the Senate, and if it were found defective for any reason, such as his own ineligibility, or irregularity in his election, or the like, yet respect for the State and for a claim which had its origin in the action of a State Legislature ought to entitle him to compensation. In Pinchback's case the Senate went further, for the Senate, by the rejection of Pinchback, decided that the body which professed to elect him was not the Legislature of the State of Louisiana; and that same Legislature which elected him for the full term elected Mr. Ray for the short term.

The Senate has committed itself by paying Pinchback to the principle that there was such uncertainty in the State of Louisiana at that time as to which was the lawful Legislature that it presented a fair question which might be decided one way or the other, and that Pinchback, who was elected by what was called the Pinchback Legislature, had such color of title as to entitle him to compensation and mileage, or at least to some compensation. If that decision were correct, it is manifestly impossible that the like measure of justice shall be refused, if we are to act consistently, to Mr. Ray who was elected by the same legislature.

Now, in respect to McMillen he was elected by what was called the McEnery legislature, and certainly I believed and certainly a large majority of those who voted against Pinchback believed that the McEnery legislature was the true Legislature of Louisiana.

Under these circumstances and without intending to perpetuate a usage which I think ought to be abolished, and holding myself perfectly free hereafter to vote against any compensation, in this particular case I do feel that it is my duty to vote for this compensation, and I do so the more readily for the reason suggested by my friend from Delaware, [Mr. SAULSBURY.] There never was a more important question before the Committee on Privileges and Elections, and seldom before the Senate, than the question what was the legal government of Louisiana in that year upon which the Committee on Privileges and Elections by the hands of Mr. Carpenter made a most elaborate and valuable and useful report. It is known to those who were on the committee at that time and to other members of the Senate, that those two gentlemen, Mr. Ray and Mr. McMillen, represented before that committee the opposite sides of that question, and rendered to the committee immense service in their investigation of it. They presented evidence pro and con; they made the arguments pro and con; and I do think under these circumstances they rendered vast aid to a committee of this body upon a great question which of itself commends this claim to the consideration of the Senate.

Being ready as anybody can be to put an end to a usage that has heretofore existed and which I think ought to be either abolished or greatly limited, I feel bound in this particular case under the peculiar circumstances to vote for the resolution.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the passage of the resolution.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 51, nays 7; as follows:

THOMAS BAYNE.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The morning hour has expired and the Senate resumes the consideration of the unfinished business of yesterday, on which the Senator from Georgia [Mr. HILL] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. ROLLINS. Will the Senator yield for a moment to enable me to take from the table a Senate bill with House amendments and concur in them. It will occupy but a moment. It is a very trifling affair. If it leads to debate I will withdraw it.

Mr. HILL. If it will only take a moment, I yield.

The Senate proceeded to consider the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. No. 349) to authorize the commissioners of the District of Columbia to refund a certain tax erroneously collected.

The amendments of the House of Representatives were as follows:

Insert after the words "Thomas Bayne" in second line, the following: "And the heirs or legal representatives of Joseph W. Beck, deceased."

Strike out in the third line the word "he" and insert the words "they are."

In line 4, strike out the word "him" and insert "them."

Insert after the word "Bayne" in the last line the words "or said Beck."

Mr. McMILLAN. What is the effect of the amendments, I should like to know?

Mr. ROLLINS. There was an error in passing the bill in the Senate. There were two small lots of land improperly taxed on the northeast corner of the Capitol grounds. These amendments merely correct the error which was made in the passage of the bill in the Senate.

The amendments of the House of Representatives were concurred in.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. GEORGE M. ADAMS, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed a resolution for the printing of 300,000 copies of the report of the Commissioner of Agriculture for 1877; in which the concurrence of the Senate was requested.

The message also announced that the House had passed a resolution for the printing of 25,000 copies of the report upon forestry, transmitted by the President to Congress from the Commissioner of Agriculture on the 13th day of December last; in which the concurrence of the Senate was requested.

The message further announced that the House had concurred in the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 2371) to amend an act entitled "An act for the support of the government of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1878, and for other purposes."

The message also announced that the House had passed the bill (S. No. 648) to constitute a commission to consider and report a plan for providing enlarged accommodations for the Library of Congress.

THE PACIFIC RAILROADS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. No. 15) to alter and amend the act entitled "An act to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from the Missouri River to the Pacific Ocean, and to secure to the Government the use of the same for postal, military, and other purposes," approved July 1, 1862, and also to alter and amend the act of Congress approved July 2, 1864, in amendment of said first-named act, the pending question being on the amendment submitted by Mr. MATTHEWS.

Mr. HILL. Mr. President, we have before us two bills, each proposing to establish a sinking fund the better to secure the repayment of a loan made by the United States to the Union Pacific and the Central Pacific Railroad Companies. The comparative merits of the two bills as sinking-fund measures I have not yet considered and shall not now discuss. I especially wish it distinctly understood that nothing I may say in the way of dissenting from the bill reported by the Judiciary Committee is to be taken as implying that I will support the bill reported from the Committee on Railroads. I repeat I have not considered and much less formed an opinion upon either of these bills as measures of wisdom, economy, or expediency. I have thus far confined my investigations, and shall now confine my remarks, to a constitutional question, a question of congressional or legislative power which is raised by these two bills.

The bill reported from the Railroad Committee proposes to establish a sinking fund with the assent of the companies as matter of agreement between the creditor and the debtor. The bill reported from the Judiciary Committee proposes to establish a sinking fund by legislative act only, by the sovereign will of the creditor, not only without the assent of the debtors, but by a command a failure or refusal to obey which by the debtors shall work a forfeiture of estate and subject them or their agents to a criminal prosecution. Such an exercise of power is, in my judgment, not only unauthorized and unconstitutional, but is actually subversive to the great purposes to secure which the Government itself was instituted.

In order to understand clearly the issue presented, I will state the material facts bearing upon the case, and I shall state the contracts as they were finally agreed to:

First, by the act of 1862, Congress created a corporate being, a body-politic, and named it the Union Pacific Railroad Company.

Second, this corporate being, thus created, Congress endowed with all the powers, privileges, and franchises usually granted to corporations, and especially authorized and empowered it "to lay out, locate, construct, furnish, maintain, and enjoy a continuous railroad and telegraph, with the appurtenances," between designated points.

Third, to this being, thus created and endowed, the Congress also granted certain privileges, such as the right of way through the public lands without compensation and through other lands with compensation, and also certain property, and especially alternate sections of the public lands amounting to several millions of acres. All these rights, powers, privileges, and grants were granted without money and without price by the sovereign grace and favor to the child thus born of the sovereign's loins.

Fourth—and I ask the Senate to mark the difference—after thus creating this corporate being, and after thus clothing it with powers and with authority to contract and be contracted with, the Congress itself proposed to authorize at once a contract with it in behalf of the United States. The Congress deemed that the construction of a railroad to the Pacific Ocean would be a great benefit to the Government in the way of saving in transportation, would greatly increase the wealth and power of the people, and perhaps maintain the integrity of the Union. To enable the Union Pacific Railroad Company to construct, equip, and maintain its portion of this railroad and telegraph line to the Pacific Ocean, Congress proposed to make it a loan in bonds, and to secure the completion of the entire line Congress made a like offer of loan to the Central Pacific Railroad Company, a corporation created by the State of California, and also authorized the latter company to extend its line east until it should meet the Union Pacific line going west.

It is important now to understand with accuracy the terms and conditions of this loan, for these terms and conditions formed the inducement to accept the offer and thus enter into the substance of the contract. The material terms and conditions are these: The bonds were to be issued directly by the Government and delivered to the companies. The Secretary of the Treasury was authorized to deliver the bonds as the roads were completed in sections. The bonds were to mature after thirty years to bear interest at the rate of 6 per cent. per annum payable semi-annually. The loans were to be repaid to the Government as follows: Previous to the maturity of the bonds the companies were to pay to the Government 5 per cent. of their net earnings and one-half the sums due by the Government for transportation over the road; and it is especially stipulated that the Government shall at all times have the preference in the use of the road and telegraph "for all the purposes aforesaid," that is, "to transmit messages and transport mails, troops, munitions of war, supplies, and public stores," and "at fair and reasonable rates of compensation not to exceed the amount paid by private parties for the same kind of service." Whatever balance should remain unpaid by this 5 per cent. and the half of the Government transportation, the companies were to repay at the maturity of the bonds. It is so expressly nominated. To secure its repayment it is stipulated that:

The issue of said bonds and delivery to the company shall ipso facto constitute a first mortgage on the whole line of the railroad and telegraph, together with the rolling-stock, fixtures, and property of every kind and description, and in consideration of which said bonds may be issued.

And in case of default by the companies, the Secretary of the Treasury is directed to take possession of the property so covered by mortgage "for the use and benefit of the United States."

I am stating the contract of loan as finally made. In the first offer in 1862 the United States were to have a first lien. In 1864 the offer was changed by Congress, so that other bonds might be issued by the companies of like amount with those of the Government, and the lien of the Government was to be subordinated to those bonds of the companies, and in this form the offer was accepted.

The entire railroad and telegraph from the Missouri River to the Pacific Ocean were completed in all respects as required, and all the conditions precedent to the issue and delivery of the bonds under the contract of loan were complied with, and the bonds were actually issued and delivered in execution of the authority; and all the rights of the creditor and all the liabilities of the debtor thus became complete, definite, and fixed, and so, as I shall prove, became unchangeable, except by consent of the parties, by every rule of law known, administered, and respected in every just government under the sun. That no power, executive, legislative, or judicial, can, under any pretext whatever, by reservation or otherwise, change, add to, alter, or rescind this contract, except upon allegation and proof of mistake or fraud in its procurement, and that no power or department of Government can grant any remedy or relief touching this contract, its payment, or further security, or can listen to any complaint touching it by either party, except upon allegation and proof of default in some respect by the other party, is the proposition I propose now to establish.

"As the tree falleth, so it must lie," and equally certain is it that as competent parties legally and knowingly contract, so must they abide their contract, and Government has no power to interfere except to protect and enforce on default such contracts according to their terms. In my opinion the bill reported from the Judiciary Committee does propose to interfere with this contract, does propose to affect and even to change the rights and liabilities of the parties to this contract, and without any allegation of default, without any pretense of default, either real or intended, and it proposes that this interference shall come from the most unauthorized of all Departments of the Government, the Legislative Department.

I have examined this bill carefully, and in all its long string of whereases it alleges no default of any kind or character as the reason for its passage. It meets the question boldly and fearlessly and is a broad assertion that Congress, by virtue of its power alone, has authority to change the contract in the manner proposed by the bill. I have listened with anxious attention to the various Senators who have so ably advocated the passage of this bill. I have listened to them all the more anxiously because I desire to co-operate with them in all efforts to secure the Government in the premises, and I am ready to vote for any plan looking to that security which Congress has the constitutional power to adopt.

The advocates of the bill do not agree among themselves in the reasons which they assign for the power claimed. After carefully considering them I am satisfied that all the advocates of this bill are embraced in the three following classes:

1. One class contends that the bill does not change or alter the contract of loan nor the rights or liabilities of the parties to it.
2. A second class insist that the mortgageors are in possession of the property under a trust, first for the benefit of creditors and afterward for the benefit of the owners, and that if the corpus of the property covered by the mortgage is insufficient to secure the debt and the mortgageors have become or are likely to become insolvent, the mortgagees have a right to have a sufficiency of the income or earnings dedicated to pay the debt before dividends shall be retained and to accumulate the income or earnings by a sinking fund until the debt shall be discharged.
3. A third class claim that in this case Congress has the power to alter, amend, add to, or rescind this contract in order to secure the debt. Some claim this power as inherent in the Government, and others claim it under the provisions of the acts of 1862 and 1864 which expressly reserve to Congress the right to "alter, add to, amend, or repeal" each of said acts. On this last ground the bill itself is based. But as there are Senators who do not concur with that reason for the power claimed but insist upon one or the other of the two reasons I have previously specified, it is proper that I should notice all these grounds, and I will consider them in their order.

First, does the bill reported from the Judiciary Committee in fact alter, or propose to alter, or will it have the effect to alter this contract of loan or the rights and liabilities of the parties to it? It is certain that the bill does not propose to alter or in any manner affect either of the acts of 1862 and 1864, except those provisions which relate to this debt and which authorize and prescribe the terms of the loan by which the debt was created. The whole bill relates to the establishment of a sinking fund to secure the ultimate payment of the debt, the manner of accumulating that sinking fund, the custody and final distribution of the fund so accumulated, and prescribes the penalties that shall be visited on the company or companies failing or refusing to pay the amount required into that sinking fund. So that, if the bill alters or amends anything in these acts or either of them, it can only be those provisions to which this bill alone refers; that is, those provisions which authorized this loan and the terms and stipulations of it. You nowhere propose to change a single franchise; you nowhere propose to withdraw a single power or privilege granted to these companies; you nowhere propose to interfere with the regulation and administration of the franchise. It is a naked proposition to secure the debt and prescribe such terms as in your judgment will secure the debt without the assent of the companies, and without alleging any default or maladministration by the companies or either of them.

Now, let us look, first, to the title of the act. What does that propose? I am now discussing the question, mark you, whether the bill does propose to alter and change the contract, for there are Senators around me who have said that they did not look upon it as a bill to alter and change the contract. Let us look, first, to the title of the act itself. In terms it is "a bill to alter and amend" the act of 1862, and also "to alter and amend" the act of 1864. "Alter and amend" what? There is not a provision of this Judiciary Committee bill that refers to anything but the contract and the debt, and you have made your bill an act to "alter and amend." So, again, the preamble says that "the rights of said several companies, respectively, as mentioned in said act of 1862, as well as just security to the United States in the premises, and in respect of all the matters set forth in said act, require that the said act of 1862 be altered and amended as hereinafter enacted." And that "by reason of the premises also, as well as for other causes of public good and justice, the powers provided and reserved in said act of 1864 for the amendment and alteration thereof ought also to be exercised as hereinafter enacted." "Hereinafter enacted" how? You do not hereinafter enact a single alteration or change in a franchise, a power, or privilege of the companies. You hereinafter enact nothing on earth but an alteration of the debt and the terms of its payment. All the alterations and amendments thus proposed relate exclusively to contract of loan and none to the franchises granted in the acts.

Then again the thirteenth section of the bill is in these words:

That each and every of the provisions in this act contained shall severally and respectively be deemed, taken, and held as in alteration and amendment of said act of 1862 and of said act of 1864, respectively, and of both said acts.

Thus in the most emphatic manner the Judiciary Committee bill declares its purpose to be "to alter and amend," and every alteration and amendment proposed is of the contract of loan and of the rights and liabilities of the parties to that contract. Not only are the liabilities of the debtors changed, but their burdens are added to by this bill. Thus, under the original contract it is distinctly stipulated that until the bonds mature the debtors shall only pay the creditor 5 per cent. of the net earnings and one-half of the Government transportation, and in the fifth section of the act of 1864 the word "only" is used; "shall only pay." Under this bill you require all the Government transportation to be paid and large sums in addition, so that the whole payment shall amount to 25 per cent. of the net earnings. It is no answer to say the additional sums paid are not to be actually or formally applied to the debt until the bonds mature. The burden upon the debtors is to pay. The fact that the creditor does not formally credit the debt does not lessen the burden of the payment. Besides, the payment is to be made into the treasury of the creditor by the act and order of the creditor; and how can you pay the creditor except by payment into his treasury? and the payment therefore is as legally and actually complete as if the money paid were formally applied and credited on the bonds or the debt.

So the eighteenth section of the act of 1862 can have no meaning except that the stockholders shall have 95 per cent. of the net earnings after deducting all expenditures, and that the Government shall not interfere to regulate the rates of fare and freight until such 95 per cent. of the net earnings shall exceed 10 per cent. of the cost of the road. This bill reduces that 95 per cent. to 75 per cent.

Again, this bill not only creates new obligations upon the companies, but provides penalties for their violation. You not only create additional obligations on the companies but you decree by virtue of your own legislative will penalties for the disregard by the companies of these obligations. The bill creates new and additional defaults to authorize the seizure of the road by the Government, and acts which are perfectly legal under existing laws are made illegal under this bill and subject the parties committing them to criminal prosecutions.

Will any man tell me that this is not a bill changing all the terms of this contract? It changes the stipulations; it changes its obligations; it prescribes additional penalties; and it makes acts which are now legal and proper and according to the stipulations of the contract actual crimes for which the parties or their agents can be prosecuted in a court of justice. You not only decree by your sovereign will a change of the contract, but you decree that the agents of the defendants who shall be faithful to the contract already made shall be criminals.

It is needless to add further statements to show that the Judiciary Committee bill does really propose to change and does in effect change the terms of the contract of loan—terms, too, which were offered as inducements to the companies to accept the loan and undertake the construction of the road. To offer terms as an inducement to a party to do a work or take a risk, and then withdraw or change those terms after the work has been done or the risk taken, would be declared fraud if done by an individual, and surely it cannot be denominated less than tyranny and oppression when done by a government.

The second class that support this bill of the Judiciary Committee upon a theory of a trust—and I invite the lawyers in this body to hear this argument—are, I must say, in my judgment easily answered. In the first place, if the power claimed exists at all, it is clearly a judicial and not a legislative power. But the position to justify this bill could not be sustained under the facts of this case, as far as they have been presented to the Senate, even in a court of equity. The rule upon this subject is familiar to lawyers and has been decided in a great number of cases. To authorize courts to interfere in the manner proposed by this bill, three facts must clearly appear: first, that the corpus of the property mortgaged is insufficient to pay the debt; second, that the mortgageor is insolvent; and, third, that the mortgageor is in default. Now, mark me, I do not say that the only default is non-payment at the maturity. Any act of the debtor which is wrong and which threatens to destroy the corpus covered by the lien of the mortgage is a default. Without the last fact the first two will not be considered. It matters not that the mortgagee is insolvent; it matters not that the property which the creditor selected to secure his debt is insufficient to pay it; those were circumstances he ought to have looked to before he made the contract. Suppose added to these two conditions there must be default, some wrongful act or failure to act by the debtor. There can be no remedy where there is no wrong, and there can be no wrong where there is no default, and courts have no right to anticipate and much less to redress a default which has not occurred. This rule is strongly stated by Mr. Thomas in his work on mortgages, in the following language:

The right of entry by the mortgagee having been abolished, the mortgagee is, both at law and in equity, entitled to the complete enjoyment of the mortgaged premises and of their rents and profits until the debt is due, unless such rents are expressly pledged for the payment of the debt. If no proceedings are taken for the appointment of a receiver, his right to the rents continues until it has been divested by a foreclosure sale, and until the purchaser has become entitled to possession under the sheriff's deed. Where, however, the security is insufficient and the mortgagee or other person who is personally liable for the payment of the debt is insolvent, the mortgagee may apply for a receiver of the rents and profits of the mortgaged premises which have not yet been collected, and this relief will be granted, unless the person in possession shall give security to account for such rents in case there shall be a deficiency.

The right to this relief does not result from the relations of the parties, but from equitable considerations alone. It is not a matter of strict right, and each application is addressed to the sound discretion of the court.—Thomas on Mortgages, pages 301 and 302.

In support of this authority and this rule Mr. Thomas refers to a large number of cases, every one of which I have examined, and every one of them was a case of foreclosure after default in payment; and I challenge any gentleman to produce a book where a case has ever been decided in which the court took jurisdiction to require additional security or to take the rents, issues, and profits from the mortgagee before default, however insufficient the property might become in the natural course of events, or however insolvent the mortgagee might become. Insolvency in law may be a misfortune; it is not a fault that furnishes a remedy unless it be accompanied by actual waste and wrong to the creditor. The rule is thus stated in the case of the Syracuse City Bank vs. Tallman and others, in 31 Barbour, and it is well stated in this decision:

Unless there be a special clause to that effect, in a mortgage, the mortgagee has no lien upon the rents and profits; and as a general rule the mortgagee, until the sale, is entitled to remain in possession.

But courts of equity, under certain circumstances, will, after default in an action for foreclosure and sale, anticipate the final judgment by the appointment of a receiver, and in effect put the mortgagee in possession and allow him to divert the rents and profits of the mortgaged premises from the hands of the mortgagee, and hold them as additional security for the payment of the mortgage.

To entitle him to this relief it must appear that the mortgaged premises are an inadequate security for the debt, and that the mortgagee, or other person liable for the mortgage debt, is insolvent.

This relief does not grow directly out of the relations of the parties or the stipulations contained in the mortgage, but out of equitable considerations alone. It is not a matter of strict right, but is addressed to the sound discretion of the court.

It seems that when the mortgagee is insolvent, and fails to pay at the day appointed, and the mortgaged premises are an inadequate security, as between the mortgagee and mortgagee it is within the equitable discretion of the court to allow the latter to intercept the rents and profits, for his better protection from loss. And that this is the utmost extent to which the relief has been granted, or to which it can be granted, within any admitted principle of equity.—The Syracuse City Bank vs. Tallman and others, 31 Barbour's Supreme Court Reports, 201.

This judge says the farthest the rule has ever gone is, that after a default and before judgment of foreclosure, a court of equity will appoint a receiver and divert the rents and profits to the payment of the debt until that judgment of foreclosure and sale under it, if the premises are insufficient to pay the debt, if the mortgagee is insolvent, and if the mortgagee is in default; and I challenge any lawyer on this floor to present a case on record to the contrary where any proceeding was taken in law or equity to divert rents, issues, and profits or earnings, which are not expressly included in the lien, from the mortgagee to the mortgagee until after default by the mortgagee. Whether I am justified in quoting legal rules to a body of men who claim to be bound by no law is a question I will consider directly.

The Government as a creditor can have no more rights than other creditors. That is the next proposition I propose to establish. When the Government loans money and enters into trade with individuals or corporations, it does so, not as a sovereign, but as a civil corporation, and is subject to all the laws of contract like other persons; and I ask the attention of Senators to this point who tell me that this Government is sovereign; that it has a right in contracts that individuals have not; that you are not bound by the rules of law like individuals.

In Smoot's case, 15 Wallace, 36, the court held "that in the construction and enforcement of contracts made by private parties with the Government, the court is bound to apply the ordinary principles which govern such contracts between individuals." So in the case of Elliot vs. Van Voorst and others, reported in 3 Wallace, jr., and decided by Mr. Justice Grier, that eminent justice said:

The Government of the United States, though limited in its powers, is supreme in its sphere of action. But its rights as a sovereign, and its prerogatives as such, are coextensive with the functions of government committed to them, and extend no further. Its position as to prerogative is anomalous, owing to our peculiar institutions.

When the Government, in the exercise of the rights and functions of a civil corporation, purchases lands to secure a debt, the accident of its sovereignty in other functions cannot be set up to destroy or affect the rights of persons claiming a title or lien on the same lands. Thus, when the Government of the United States becomes a partner in a trading corporation, such as the United States Bank, it divested itself, so far as concerned the transactions of that company, of its sovereign character, and took that of a citizen; consequently its property and interests were subject to the decrees and judgments of courts equally with that of its co-partners.

It may be broadly asserted that no case can be found in all the books where a court of equity has entertained an application to do what this bill proposes to do, unless the debtor was in default; and when the Government, abandoning its own courts, seeks to use its sovereign legislative power to enforce, to alter, or even to protect its rights as a civil corporation or contract creditor, it is guilty of the grossest possible usurpation, tyranny, and oppression. The Government is a contractor in the loan of money as a civil corporation. It cannot resort to its sovereign power as a legislative body to claim rights in the construction or remedies in the enforcement of that contract which are not common to the humblest individual in the land. Legislation may authorize contracts to be made, but after they are made legislative power over them ends, I care not whether made by Government or citizen. Courts alone can construe them; courts alone can reform them; courts alone can enforce them; and courts alone can administer them; and even courts can construe them, or reform them, or enforce them, or administer them only as made and agreed to by both the parties.

Let us next proceed to examine the position taken by the third class who support this bill reported from the Judiciary Committee. These are they who take the bold position that Congress has the power by legislation to "add to, alter, amend, or repeal" this contract of loan between the Government and the railroad companies. And, first, I will notice those of this class who hold that this power is inherent in the Government. "One Congress cannot bind another Congress," we are told. "What one Congress can do, another Congress can undo," is repeated. That I believe is the position of my friend from North Carolina, [Mr. MERRIMON.] It is true as to general laws; but a contract is not a law. The law is the authority to make the contract, mark the distinction, and nothing more. Congress may repeal the authority to make the contract; it may change or modify the authority to make the contract; and, if the authority be repealed before the contract is made, the authority ceases, and the contract cannot afterward be made. But if the contract be made and rights under it vest or obligations by it are incurred, the subsequent repeal of the authority cannot annul or impair the contract or its rights and obligations. I think much of the confusion in this case has grown out of confounding the law which authorizes the contract with the contract itself. And I will say at this point that Congress is not the Government and Congress is not the party to the contract in question. Congress did authorize the contract to be made and did prescribe the terms on which it should be made; but one Congress did not make the contract, and another Congress cannot undo it. It was not the acts of Congress, but the loan of the bonds and their acceptance by the company that constituted the consideration of the contract. It was the completion of the work in the manner prescribed that entitled the companies to the issue and delivery of the bonds. The act for that purpose would have been a dead-letter, would have formed no contract, if the work had not been done; and it was not Congress, as seems to be so commonly supposed, but the "issue and delivery of the bonds that ipso facto" constituted the mortgage to secure the repayment of the bonds.

Congress can repeal the authority, and Congress can do it without reserving the power; but can Congress annul the acts done and the rights vested under the authority before its repeal? Can Congress repeal or annul the issue and delivery of the bonds? Can Congress repeal or annul the work done, which entitled the companies to the issue and delivery of the bonds? But the contract cannot subsist independently of its terms. The terms of the contract authorize, constitute the contract itself, as the blocks of marble in this building make the building. Take away those blocks, and the building will not exist. As Congress cannot repeal, annul, impair, or change the contract, so Congress cannot repeal, annul, impair, or change the terms of the contract; and the time of payment, the manner of payment, the terms of payment, the quantities of payment, the security for payment, and the penalty for default in payment are included among the essential, material terms of the contract.

It is suggested as a query in the report made by the Judiciary Committee in support of their bill whether Congress may not impair the obligations of a contract other than by a uniform law of bankruptcy. It is suggested that the inhibition in the Constitution to impair the obligation of contracts is upon the States, and not upon Congress. Is an inhibition upon the States a delegation to Congress? Can Congress do anything because it is not prohibited from doing it? Congress may do many things from which the destruction or impairment of contracts may result. Congress may lay embargoes and declare war, and this may impair or destroy the value of contracts; but does it follow that Congress may therefore enact laws to impair and annul contracts? Congress may declare war, and war does destroy life and liberty as well as property. Can Congress therefore pass laws enacting that the homes of the people shall be burned, or that the citizens shall all be imprisoned or enslaved, or that their heads shall be taken off? Yet all these things may result from a war which Congress has power to declare. If Congress has power directly to declare the result which may come from another power than Congress may declare that our homes shall be burned, that ourselves shall be imprisoned and our heads taken off at the block. The mission of government, it can never be too often repeated, is to preserve and protect life, liberty, and property, and not to destroy or impair either, except it be necessary to expose some to loss or hazard that all may be protected and defended.

I affirm to-day without qualification that no legislative power in this country, State or Federal, can pass any act with intent to annul or impair the obligations of contract; and even the power to pass a bankrupt law forms no exception to this rule, as that power stands on a different principle. I affirm that this power would not exist even if the prohibition in the Federal Constitution upon the States in this regard did not exist.

A few days ago the Senator from Ohio [Mr. THURMAN] in a colloquy with the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MITCHELL] made the remarkable statement in this Senate that "not one lawyer who argued the Dartmouth College case pretended for one single moment that, if it were not for the provision in the Federal Constitution that no State should make any law impairing the obligation of a contract, the act of the New Hampshire Legislature would not have been perfectly valid." That is the exact language of the honorable Senator from Ohio. Coming from such a distinguished source, this startling statement ought to wake up this Senate to the dangerous mistake we are asked to make in the passage of this Judiciary bill, when the great Ajax in favor of its passage intimates by such a statement so roundly made that Congress has the power to impair the obligation of contracts, and that the States would have held that power but for the provisions in the Federal Constitution. He says that no lawyer pretended to assert the contrary in the Dartmouth College case. Now, sir, Mr. Webster was one of the great lawyers who argued that Dartmouth College case. Hear what he said. Mr. Webster said:

It will be contended by the plaintiffs that these acts—are not valid and binding on them without their assent: 1. Because they are against common right and the constitution of New Hampshire. 2. Because they are repugnant to the Constitution of the United States.

Then after stating that it was only that clause in the Constitution which enabled the Federal courts to get jurisdiction of the question he adds these grand words, which I commend to the distinguished Senator from Ohio and to the country, in this time, it seems to me, of demoralization on this question.

Mr. Webster said:

It is not too much to assert that the Legislature of New Hampshire would not have been competent to pass the acts in question, and to make them binding on the plaintiffs without their assent, even if there had been in the Constitution of New Hampshire or of the United States no special restriction on their power.

Why?

Because these acts are not the exercise of a power properly legislative. Their object and effect is to take away from one rights, property, and franchises, and to grant them to another. This is not the exercise of a legislative power. To justify the taking away of vested rights, there must be a forfeiture; to adjudge upon and declare which, is the proper province of the judiciary.

Even Chief-Justice Marshall, in pronouncing the decision of the court, said almost as much, for he uses this strong language:

A repeal of this charter—

The Dartmouth College charter, granted by the King in 1769—

A repeal of this charter at any time prior to the adoption of the present Constitution of the United States would have been an extraordinary and unprecedented act of power.

So the distinguished Senator from Ohio was clearly mistaken.

In the forty-fourth number of the Federalist Mr. Madison declared that "laws impairing the obligation of contracts are contrary to what? Contrary to the first principles of the social compact and to every principle of sound legislation." The prohibition was not inserted in the Federal Constitution to take from the States a power they would possess without the prohibition. They might arbitrarily exercise a power they did not possess and oppress a citizen. Mr. Madison speaks of it as only an "additional fence" against the danger of invasion of the "first principles of the social compact" and the proper fundamental charters of natural rights. This prohibition, this "additional fence" was placed in the Federal Constitution to bring the citizen within the protection of the Federal jurisdiction against such dangerous and unnatural legislation in the States. What a commentary upon this purpose of protection it will be if the Federal Government shall itself turn upon the citizen it takes into its protection and itself make him the helpless victim of this dangerous legislation against the first principles of the social compact and the fundamental charters of natural rights! This would be saving the dear lambs from exposure by fencing them for slaughter.

I will proceed now, sir, to the last stronghold of the supporters of this Judiciary bill, and I do so with a confident conviction that it is the weakest of all the positions assumed to justify the bill. It is that Congress derives the power claimed from these provisions of the acts of 1862 and 1864 which expressly reserve to Congress the right at any time "to add to, alter, amend, or repeal" said acts. I invite the attention of the Senate to several considerations, either one of which is and in its nature must be a complete and conclusive negative to the proposition that Congress retains or can have at this time any power whatever to interfere with these contracts as against the companies by virtue of these reservations in the acts named. In the first place, the power reserved must be legislative power. Congress possesses no other power in the matter. But the making of a contract is not a legislative act. So the enforcing of a contract is not a legislative function.

Mr. EDMUNDS. May I ask the Senator from Georgia, then, where we got the power to make the contract which is in this law which we propose to amend?

Mr. HILL. If the Senator will listen, I will answer that question. You get the power to authorize the contract and you do by law authorize the contract to be made; but it is expressly decided that not the Congress but the Government is the party to the contract and not a party in its sovereign character but as a civil corporation.

Mr. EDMUNDS. But, if the Senator will pardon me, he has stated that it is no part of the function of the legislative power to make a contract. Now, then, the only power that has been exerted in respect of these railroads by the acts of 1862 and 1864 was a power exerted by Congress, and the Senator says that that made a contract.

Mr. HILL. I do not so understand that the acts are all. I say here now that if nothing had been done but to pass the acts there would have been no contract. Would there? Answer that. The Senator says there was nothing done but to pass the acts. If there had been nothing done but to pass the acts there would have been corporations created; those corporations would have been vested with corporate powers and privileges, because that is done by the direct act of Congress; but if the acts had been passed and if nothing else had been done would there have been any contract?

Mr. EDMUNDS. No, if the Senator will again pardon me, no more than if I write to my friend and ask him to lend me a hundred dollars and he does not reply, there is no contract; but if he sends me the money there is a contract that I am to repay him.

Mr. HILL. Ah! precisely so, sir. It was the act of the party under the judgment and adjudication of the executive department and the issue and the delivery of the bonds in compliance with the authority of Congress to make the contract that created the obligations and the rights. That is the point. Congress gives the authority to make the contracts. I grant that without the authority the contracts cannot be made, but equally the authority without the other acts makes no contract. Legislation only authorized the contracts to be made. Legislation did not complete the roads nor determine when the roads were completed; nor did legislation issue or deliver the bonds. The acts of Congress constituted the power of attorney which authorized all these things to be done, which prescribed the manner of doing them, and the terms and conditions upon which they should be done. I admit that power of attorney was in its nature and by its terms revocable at will. Note that. Congress can revoke the authority as a mere act of power, but Congress cannot annul the acts done under that authority before that revocation.

Suppose I give the Senator from Michigan [Mr. CHRISTIANCY] a power of attorney to sell a piece of land and in that power prescribe, as I have a right to do, the terms upon which he shall make the sale, and I also say in the power what it is not necessary to say, that it is revocable at will. Is that power of attorney a contract? Without the power the Senator would have no authority to make a contract, but is that power of attorney a contract? Will any man say so? The Senator proceeds, under that power, and on the terms therein prescribed, sells the land to the Senator from Vermont, places the Senator in possession and takes his promissory note due at a distant time. After this sale and before the purchase-money is paid, suppose I undertake to revoke the power to sell or change the terms of the sale. Does that revocation annul or impair the sale? Can I even complain that the terms of the contract as required by my own power of attorney do not sufficiently secure me, and demand a change in the terms, or additional security before there is any default in payment by the purchaser? Congress reserved the power "to add to, alter, amend, or repeal the acts" of 1862 and 1864. We reserved no right or power "to add to, alter, amend, or repeal" the contracts made in pursuance and under the authority of these acts. I am dwelling upon this because I consider it important. When so good a lawyer as the Senator from Vermont, the chairman of the Judiciary Committee, intimates that an act of Congress is the contract when it is the authority for the contract, it is time, I think, for us to watch the distinction. The contract was made, the work was done, the obligations were all incurred, the promises were all made and the bonds were all issued and delivered according to the authority and by virtue of the authority, and while the authority remained unrevoked. The proposition that, under a reserved power to change or revoke the authority, to make the contracts, Congress can change or interfere with the contracts made, or can do anything that will affect to the weight of a hair the rights or liabilities of the other parties to the contracts without their consent and before their default, is most monstrous in its character, and can find nothing to excuse or palliate it in good faith, just precedent, or sound law.

Sir, Congress can do nothing, absolutely nothing, touching these contracts against the other parties thereto without their consent and before their default.

The view I am presenting is, if possible, rendered still more conclusive when we apply to it another well-settled principle which I have before stated upon authorities cited, and which could be strengthened by a great number of decisions. It is that the Government is not a party to contracts like these contracts of loan in its character as a sovereign but only as a civil corporation. As a sovereign the Government does not lend money. As a civil corporation it does not legislate. As a civil corporation it is subject to the law of contracts precisely as are individuals. When, therefore, the Government as a civil corporation enters into such contracts it cannot reserve the right to use its legislative power as a sovereign to alter, change, or annul that contract to which it is a party. As a civil corporation it can reserve no power which in its character as a civil corporation it does not possess.

Mr. THURMAN. I wish to understand my friend, but will not put a question if it interrupts him at all. He has spoken repeatedly of the Government lending this money as a civil corporation and of what rights the Government has as a mere corporation. I can understand very well how that may be applied were the Government a shareholder in a bank, as in the old United States Bank, or a shareholder in a railroad, or the like; but I am totally at a loss to understand what my friend means by speaking of the Government in granting a loan of its credit acting as a private or mere civil corporation apart and distinct from its character as a government.

Mr. HILL. I will answer the Senator by referring to the decision made that I have just read, by Justice Grier, in which he announced that when the Government purchased land and took a deed to it, it was a party to that contract only as a civil corporation and it so acted, and that its sovereignty had nothing to do with it.

Mr. THURMAN. This was a Government loan.

Mr. HILL. It is the same thing whether the Government loans money or takes a deed. The judge added that whenever the Government becomes a trader it trades only as a civil corporation. Its authority is derived from Congress, it is true. The civil corporation has no authority to make a contract unless Congress grants it, but it is a party to the contract only in its character as a civil corporation. That is what I mean, and I tell the Senator I am using the language of the court; and if the Senator takes issue with it he makes as great a mistake as he did in the colloquy with the Senator from Oregon, when he said that no lawyer in the argument of the Dartmouth College case pretended that but for the provision in the Federal Constitution the laws of New Hampshire would not have been valid.

The power reserved in the acts of 1862 and 1864 is a legislative power to alter, amend, or repeal legislative acts, and not to alter or rescind contracts, though made by the authority of legislative acts. It was a power reserved by and for the benefit of the sovereign, and was not and could not be reserved by or for the benefit of the civil corporation as such. To say that the Government reserves the right to alter or rescind a contract made, because it reserves the right to alter or repeal the legislative act which authorized the contract to be made, is to utterly ignore the distinction between the sovereign and the civil corporation and absolves the Government from all the law and all the obligations of contracts.

Mr. THURMAN. If it does not interrupt the Senator, will he let me ask him a question?

Mr. HILL. Yes, sir.

Mr. THURMAN. Will the Senator tell us what there is in these acts of 1862 and 1864 that Congress can amend, add to, alter, or repeal?

Mr. HILL. Oh, I will do that. I am going to show that.

Mr. THURMAN. I should like to have the Senator do so.

Mr. HILL. I assure the Senator I will do that with a great deal of pleasure, and I shall leave that question I trust as clear as the other, although I am afraid that like that it will not be clear to the distinguished Senator from Ohio.

The Congress is vested by the Constitution with express authority "to borrow money on the credit of the United States." It borrows in its character as a sovereign, and for that reason cannot be sued without its consent, because that express power is given in the Constitution. The difference is between the authority which created the Government. There is no sovereign power conferred to lend money, and when the Government does lend money it does so as a civil corporation upon the authority of sovereign power, and, in case of default, must come to the courts like other individuals or corporations, and can there be impeached like the humblest citizen in the land. This may seem anomalous, but nevertheless it is true. Judge Grier, in the decision referred to, spoke of the anomalous character of our institutions.

The allusion by the Senator from Michigan [Mr. CHRISTIANCY] to mail contractors and the powers of the Government over their contracts has no relevancy whatever to the question before us. Surely that Senator is too good a constitutional lawyer not to see the difference between the relations of the Government with its servants, employés, officers, and agents, and with those who do not sustain that relation.

And now, Mr. President, what is the true meaning of the reservation to "add to, alter, amend, or repeal," found in slightly varying phraseology in both the act of 1862 and the amendatory act of 1864? I shall come directly to answer the question of the Senator from Ohio, and I will show him to what these words do apply, to what they can only apply; and I affirm it with very great confidence. This point in the case I deem important and I have studied it thoroughly to the best of my humble ability. I say I will prove to the Senate, I trust, (I have certainly satisfied my own mind beyond the shadow of a shade of doubt) that these words do not only not apply to these contracts of loan but in their nature cannot be made to apply to the contracts of loan or to the portions of the charter relating to the contracts as such. These words have a meaning and a history which identifies that meaning beyond the possibility of mistake. First, these words are never used in ordinary legislation because such use is wholly unnecessary. The right to "add to, alter, amend, or repeal" legislative acts is an inherent part of ordinary legislative power. The legislation, then, in which it is necessary to retain such a reservation, must stand upon some peculiar footing by reason of some peculiar character different from ordinary legislation. When we find this peculiarity of legislation we shall be able to comprehend the true purpose, application and meaning of this reservation. The habit of making this reservation is of modern origin, and has grown into its great importance and general use by a great and enlightening experience.

This peculiarity of legislation applies only to the creation of corporations and to the granting and regulating the exercise of the privileges, powers, and franchises of corporations. In every constitutional provision, and—I invite the Senator's attention to this—in every act of legislation, general or special, in which this reservation is found, it relates to corporations. Every case which has been read or referred to in this debate, and every case reported in which these words of reservation have been brought before the courts for adjudication, is a case of a corporation, a case involving questions relating to the franchises of a corporation, the franchises proper, granted by direct fiat of the legislative will, not by the intervention of executive authority. By the law of inductive reasoning, then, we are brought to the conclusion that there is some peculiar reason in the character of the legislation creating corporations and fixing and regulating their franchises which makes this reservation wise or necessary, and which reason does not apply to ordinary legislation. Now, let us find this reason. What is it that is deemed necessary to reserve the power to alter, amend, or repeal and add words which are never found necessary to be used in any other legislation? Evidently it is because of some peculiarity in the nature of the legislation creating corporations and granting corporate powers and franchises. The creation of artificial persons and the granting of powers, privileges, and functions to such persons is a prerogative, a sovereign prerogative power. In England it formerly rested in the Crown; in this country it rests in the States, to be exercised by the Legislature, or by such other power or body as the people in the constitution may direct.

I will not stop now to inquire whether or to what extent it may be exercised by Congress. The exercise of this prerogative power is an act of sovereign grace and favor. It is not bought. There is no consideration for it passing from the favored grantee to the sovereign grantor; but there is generally an inducement for the exercise of this power by the sovereign. That inducement is the public good—a public good which is to be secured and promoted by the manner in which the grantee, the corporation, shall exercise the franchises graciously bestowed upon it. It was held even in England that the sovereign having once granted a charter of incorporation could not revoke it. Having called the child into life it could not destroy it without a judgment of its peers, the courts. Parliament, under a claim of omnipotent power, did sometimes revoke charters, but even this power was not cordially conceded. Thus a corporation once created (except corporations exclusively political) could not afterward be dissolved, except by a judgment of a competent court, after trial, that the franchises had been forfeited, either by a nonuser or misuser of the charter. That was the case in England when the colonies were part of that country.

Early in our history, after the formation of our constitutional system, it was decided both by State courts and the Federal courts that a charter, not political, once granted and accepted, could not be changed or revoked by the legislative power without the consent of the corporation. I quote several cases for that. See University vs. Fox, 2 Haywood's Reports; Terrill vs. Taylor, 9 Cranch; Pawlett vs. Clarke, 9 Cranch. But the great struggle was made in the case of the Trustees of Dartmouth College vs. Woodward, 4 Wheaton, 518. That case was elaborately argued, and has since been accepted as settling this question. Settling what question? That the charter once granted could not be changed or altered by the granting power, although freely granted, as an act of favor simply, for the public good, and not altogether or chiefly for the personal good of the grantee.

But the creation of corporations and the grant to them of franchise powers and privileges is a voluntary grant by the legislative power, and the only consideration for such exercise of this prerogative power is the public good. The grant being thus voluntary, it followed from a well-established principle that the grantor when making it could qualify the grant according to his will, and, among other qualifications, could reserve the right to alter, amend, or withdraw the franchise, and this reservation would become a condition of the grant. Just like an individual person, if he makes a conveyance for value he must follow the terms of the contract. If he makes a voluntary conveyance, if it is a mere grant without consideration, even though it may be for natural love and affection, the grantor can prescribe such terms as he pleases; and in the case of a mere voluntary grant at any time before execution and delivery it can be revoked. The object of the grant being the public good, it was wise and proper that the grantor should retain this control over its exercise, so as to secure more certainly and effectively this object. In this way the habit of making the reservation we are considering originated, and I repeat these words of reservation are only found in charters granted to corporations and they apply to nothing but franchises granted to corporations. The fact that there is something else included in the act which creates a charter besides the franchise does not apply the words of the reservation to those other matters. The words of reservation are put in under this law of necessity to reserve the right to revoke, alter, or change the charter if the grantee, who is the recipient of sovereign power, does not execute the grant to accomplish the object for which it was made. The wonderful increase in the number, kind, and power of corporations in late years has made this reservation all the more important in character and the more frequent in its exercise. This reservation is now to be found in nearly all the States of the Union, sometimes in the constitutions, sometimes as provisions of general laws, and often in special charters; but in all cases the reservations are made to apply to corporations and special legislative grants, and to them only. To apply them to any other kind of legislation is utterly unwarranted and cannot be justified by principle, precedent, reason, or authority.

Now, let us apply these principles to the acts of 1862 and 1864 creating these corporations, and I will tell the Senator from Ohio what, in all those acts, is subject to the power of Congress to alter, repeal, modify, add to, or change. The corporations are created by direct fiat of the legislative will. All the usual and special corporate powers, privileges, and franchises are granted, in like manner, to the corporations so created, and they are granted directly. None of these grants are to be executed by the Secretary of the Treasury or by the executive department. I call the Senator's attention to that. None of these grants in the creation of the corporation, the granting of the corporate privileges, powers, and franchises, are to be executed by the Secretary of the Treasury or by the executive department. They are perfect and complete the moment that they are passed. They are made so by the very act. They are complete and perfect, and executed by the legislative act, and are not made so by another power under authority of the legislative act.

Mr. THURMAN. Let me understand the Senator, if I do not interrupt him too much? If I understand my friend, he makes this distinction, that because these bonds issued by the Government were required to be signed by the Secretary of the Treasury and handed over by the Secretary of the Treasury, that was a different thing from a contract made by Congress on behalf of the Government of the United States.

Mr. HILL. The Senator will hear me. My point is that those provisions of the act of 1862 and 1864 which authorized a loan of money do not perfect any right in anybody. They simply authorized the executive department to do certain things to be done by the department. But I say the creation of the corporation itself, the granting of the franchises to that corporation, is complete by a simple act of legislation without the intervention of executive agencies.

Mr. THURMAN. Now let me put a question to my friend, for he does not seem to have considered it, at least I have not heard it. I ask him when Congress passed this act and promised this loan of bonds, whether the moment the company accepted the charter that was not, according to his view of the case, a contract between the Government and the company, and that in good faith the Government was bound then to issue the bonds, the company doing what would entitle it to the bonds? I ask him, further, whether any executive officer of this Government had the slightest discretion in the world in the business to refuse to issue the bonds or not; whether the Secretary of the Treasury was not bound to issue them according to the mandate of Congress if the company complied?

Now, may I ask the Senator one further question, whether or not in that respect there is the slightest difference between the franchises granted by the charter and this loan promised by the Government? The franchises granted by the charter were not granted upon the mere approval by the President of the act. They did not take effect until the company accepted them, for you cannot force a grant on anybody. Therefore, it required two to make those franchises come into being, just as much as it required two to make this loan come into existence.

Mr. HILL. And the point is that it requires more than two to give effect to this legislation for the loan. My point is that the corporation is created and the franchises conferred by the act of Congress, of course by consent of the other party, and that no executive agency intervened for any purpose; that it becomes complete in the parties by the passage of the act.

Mr. THURMAN. Now let me ask—

Mr. HILL. But I will answer the Senator. Just wait and see if I do not. I answer the Senator that the passage of those provisions of these laws authorizing the loan do not make the loan. It created a right to have a loan, but I say to the Senator before the right to those loans could accrue not only must the company accept the proposition, but they must go to work and earn the consideration which entitled them to it; and the executive department and not the legislative is to determine by its judgment whether they have complied with the contract. The corporations might act until doomsday and they might have had a thousand acts by Congress, but if the executive department had not pronounced and adjudged that they had complied with their contract their right would have been only inchoate and not perfect to the loan. So there is a difference and I want the Senate to note it. It is the difference in the books; it is the difference upon reason. It is the very secret of these reservations in these charters. In a charter granted directly by the sovereign power nothing is required to perfect the grant except the acceptance from the grantee, whereas authority to lend money, an act of Congress to lend money, is only a power conferred to one of the Executive Departments. It is true they must obey authority as they do in every other case, but it is true, as the courts have often decided, that they are the judges whether the acts are complied with, and they must adjudge and determine that the work has been completed in the manner required before any right to the loan can vest in these corporations.

Mr. THURMAN. I ask the Senator if the corporation does the work, fully and fairly entitling itself to the loan, and a Secretary of the Interior or of the Treasury should refuse willfully and without cause to issue the bonds, whether a mandamus would not lie?

Mr. HILL. Certainly, if the Secretary of the Treasury adjudged that the work was complete; but suppose the executive authority denied that the work was complete. How then? Suppose they will not issue the bonds, will a mandamus lie? Certainly a mandamus will lie where the right is perfect and complete and it is conceded, but what is needed is for the bonds to be issued, signed, and delivered.

But suppose the judges of the contract will not execute it. Suppose the Secretary of the Treasury and the Secretary of the Interior in the respective parts they have got to perform in this agency adjudged that the work is not completed according to the contract, would a thousand acts entitle them to the bonds, would a thousand mandamuses secure them? Sir, it is expressly decided by the Supreme Court in the celebrated case of Decatur vs. Spanning and others, that the Department is the judge of the evidence in such cases; that while we have to command the Department they have a right to judge in certain matters; that when it is referred by Congress to them to judge when a contract had been executed, when a right has become vested which Congress has strictly authorized, the courts cannot interfere with that question; but if the Executive Department says, "You have complied but I am not bound to obey the act of Congress," then the courts will come in by mandamus and compel obedience, but the courts cannot interfere with the judgment of the Secretary or of the Executive Department. I do say to the Senator that before these parties are entitled to this loan they not only had to do the work but the Executive Department had to adjudge the work as rightfully done under the act. Therefore in the matter of this loan another department of the Government was introduced to perfect it and it does not take place upon the mere grant of incorporation and the granting of the franchises to the companies. The Legislature grants those, and the grant is not dependent on the executive authority or any judgment or adjudication by the executive authority for the absolute and unconditional vesting of their rights.

Mr. THURMAN. If the President does not approve the bill, I do not think they will have it.

Mr. HILL. Oh, well, of course that is a part of the legislation. I say the legislation is completed, and when I say that of course I mean the approval of the President or the passage of the bill by two-thirds over his veto. My friend from Ohio is getting decidedly hypercritical.

How different are the contracts of loan authorized by these acts. Here the legislation becomes mere authority to the Executive Department. The loans are for a valuable consideration. The inducements which make the Congress willing to authorize the loans are all set out. The terms and conditions of the loans are prescribed. What shall be done to entitle the corporations to the loans; how the loans shall be secured and how repaid; what shall be the liabilities of the corporations accepting the loans; and when, in what manner, and on what terms the loans shall be repaid are all declared. But all these provisions are nothing but directions to the Executive Department, who are authorized by these legislative provisions—these powers of attorney—to complete the work and deliver the bonds, or adjudge that they shall not be delivered as the case may be, and Congress actually has nothing to do. The executive power is to ascertain and determine when the corporations have completed the roads in sections; the executive authority is to determine and make known when the entire roads are completed. The Secretary of the Treasury is to issue and deliver the bonds, and here is a point to which I challenge the attention of Senators. It is in that very act of 1862 declared to be the "issue and delivery of the bonds" that constitute the mortgage. You may have a thousand acts, and without all this executive agency intervening, and the actual execution, issue, and delivery of the bonds there would be no mortgage.

Without these executive acts there were no contracts, no loans, and no obligations created, and none could have existed, although by the legislative acts they were all authorized to be made and created. The legislative acts created the corporations and invested them with corporate powers, privileges, and franchises without any intervening executive agency; but the legislative acts did not make but only authorized the contracts of loan to be made by the intervention of executive agency, and without the actual execution of that agency the contracts would have had no existence.

Without the reservations "to add to, alter, amend, or repeal the acts," the charters granted and the franchises conferred could never have been changed or revoked. The reservations were only necessary to retain legislative control over the corporations and their franchises, and for that purpose only were they made. It was not necessary to reserve the right to alter or repeal the authority to make the loans.

There is another distinction to which I call the attention of the Senator from Ohio: under the Dartmouth College decision and under all the decisions of all the courts, State and Federal, it was necessary to reserve the right to alter, repeal, or change the franchises granted to a corporation, but it was never held by any court that it was necessary to reserve the right to alter or change the authority to make a loan. The Congress had inherent power to change or repeal the legislative authority, to make the loans, but Congress has and can have no authority inherent or reserved to alter or rescind the contracts of loan after the authority to make them had been executed. From the moment of that execution the authority became exhausted, dead, and the contract became instinct with life which life it will be crime to destroy by force. From that moment the loans became plain contract debts which no power can destroy or impair save the power that made them, the consent of both parties. As the Supreme Court justly say in a recent case (3 Otto, 255:) "Two minds are required to make a contract or to change its terms and conditions after it is executed."

It can make no difference that the authority to make the loans was created in the acts granting the corporate charters, and that is where all this trouble has come from. These gentlemen have never got the true view, because the offer to loan was included in the acts granting the charter. That fact cannot change either the nature or the law of the contracts as made. They stand precisely as if the authority had been given by separate and independent acts of Congress.

Thus, sir, I have shown:

First. That the bill reported from the Judiciary Committee, under the form of altering the acts under authority of which these contracts were made, does in fact seek to alter and change the contracts themselves, and without the consent of the parties to those contracts.

Second. That such legislative power cannot be found in the theory of trusts. That the power to interfere under that theory exists only in the courts, and that even the courts can exercise such a power only after default.

Third. That the reservations "to alter, amend, or repeal," contained in the acts of 1862 and 1864, apply, and were intended to apply, and can only apply to the corporate existence, powers and franchises of the railroad companies created and confirmed by those acts. That the reservations were not needed or intended to give to Congress the power to alter or repeal the authority to make the loans provided for in those acts, and that no authority can exist in Congress, inherently or by reservation, to alter or rescind the contracts actually made under that authority after that authority had been executed, after the contract had been made, and after the rights and liabilities of the parties to those contracts had become vested and fixed.

I beg to call the attention of the Senate to some considerations upon the assumption, for argument's sake, that the words "to alter, amend, or repeal" do apply to the contract, to the authority to make the contract, and to the terms of the contract, as well as the creation of the corporation and the granting of the franchise. First, I want to call the attention of the Senate to this point: If this reservation to alter or amend does apply, for instance, to that stipulation in the contract which says that one-half of the transportation by the Government shall be paid before the maturity of the bonds, suppose that power to change that is retained by the act of 1862 or the act of 1864. Here is the act of 1871, which expressly directs that that half transportation shall be paid, and that act reserves no right to alter or amend. I wish the Senator from Ohio to hear this. I wish him to reply to it if he can. I say the act of 1871, being the ninth section of an act making appropriations for the support of the Army for the year ending June 30, 1872, and for other purposes, provides that—

The Secretary of the Treasury is hereby directed to pay over in money to the Pacific Railroad Companies mentioned in said act, and performing services for the United States, one-half of the compensation at the rate provided by law for such services heretofore or hereafter rendered.

And it distinctly says:

Provided, That this section shall not be construed to affect the legal rights of the Government or the obligations of the companies, except as herein specifically provided.

Now, here is the act of 1871, which enacts and declares that the half of this transportation shall be paid by the Secretary of the Treasury to the companies, and no power is reserved in the act of 1871 to alter, amend, or repeal that act. Take the case proposed by my friend here from the Judiciary Committee, and you see that the bill provides in the fourth section—

That there shall be carried to the credit of the said fund, on the 1st day of February in each year, the one-half of the compensation for services hereinbefore named, rendered for the Government by said Central Pacific Railroad Company, not applied in liquidation of interest.

Mr. THURMAN. Do I understand the Senator from Georgia to say that that act of 1871 is irrevocable?

Mr. HILL. I say it is after the parties have acted under it.

Mr. THURMAN. That is all I wanted to know, if the Senator so stated.

Mr. HILL. I do. Is it not part of the contract?

Mr. THURMAN. Part of what contract?

Mr. HILL. Part of the contract authorized by the acts of 1862 and 1864.

Mr. THURMAN. Now the Senator is coming precisely to where I wanted him to come. He has now got beyond the loan, and I want him to tell me this—

Mr. HILL. I am now arguing the case upon the assumption that the words "to alter, amend, or repeal" apply.

Mr. THURMAN. Then I want to know what in the world it is in that charter which can come within that power of amendment, alteration, or repeal.

Mr. HILL. The Senator does not see the point. I am arguing the case now upon the assumption that the word "alter" applies to everything there. Do you not perceive? But by the act of 1864 Congress agreed that one-half the transportation should be paid to the companies. Congress reserved the right to alter, as the Senator says, in the acts of 1862 and 1864, and for some reason the Government did not pay it. Then you come in with the act of 1871 and re-enact that they should have that one-half.

Mr. BAYARD. May I ask the Senator a question? Does he consider that the power reserved to the Government to amend the law of 1864 at will is exhausted by making an amendment in 1871?

Mr. HILL. I certainly do as to that particular thing, because the last act repeals the first. I think if you in a subsequent act make a direct enactment and do not reserve the power to repeal you cannot afterward alter or change that act.

Mr. THURMAN. The Senator himself, if he will allow me to interrupt him, has stated the matter which shows what the act of 1871 was. Under the act of 1864 the companies were entitled to receive pay for half the transportation account. The Secretary of the Treasury refused to pay them that half under an opinion of Mr. Attorney-General Akerman. The matter was referred to Congress; that is to say, the companies petitioned Congress on the subject. The Judiciary Committees of the Senate and the House reported that under the act of 1864 the companies were entitled to this money, half the transportation account, and the act of 1871 was passed to compel the Secretary to execute the law, not to change the law or to make any new law, but simply to compel him to execute it.

Mr. HILL. No; but you did declare in the act of 1864 that one-half of the transportation shall be paid with a reservation.

Mr. THURMAN. What reservation?

Mr. HILL. The reservation of the right to alter. That is what you say. I am arguing on that assumption now, which the Senator from Ohio does not seem to take. I am arguing upon the assumption that you are right, and yet I show that your bill is unconstitutional; for I say that afterward you enacted again that these companies should have the half transportation without reservation, and that they should not only have it for the past but should have it forever. That is the act of 1871.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Will the Senator read the act of 1871 which shows that?

Mr. HILL. I have just read it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I wish he would read it again for general information.

Mr. HILL. It is as follows:

The Secretary of the Treasury is hereby directed to pay over in money to the Pacific Railroad Companies mentioned in said act, and performing services for the United States, one-half of the compensation at the rate provided by law for such services, heretofore or hereafter rendered.

And lest this act might be construed to interfere with the reservation in the act of 1864 in some other point besides this, you go on and provide—

That this section shall not be construed to affect the legal rights of the Government or the obligations of the companies, except as herein specifically provided.

That is as to the half transportation account.

Mr. BAILEY. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. HILL. Yes, sir.

Mr. BAILEY. The Senator says the act of 1871 exhausted the power to amend or repeal the act of 1864.

Mr. HILL. As to this particular provision.

Mr. BAILEY. Will the Senator point out in what particular the act of 1871 alters, amends, or repeals the act of 1864?

Mr. HILL. It re-enacts. Gentlemen will not understand me. In the act of 1864 you enacted a right with a reservation, and you claim the right to change it by virtue of that reservation. In the act of 1871 you enacted the same right without reservation. That is the point; and I defy any lawyer to get over it. Is not the right without a reservation an amendment and improvement upon a right with a reservation? Is not an absolute right better than a qualified right?

Mr. EDMUNDS. May I ask the Senator whether he thinks the act of 1871 became a contract by the mere passage of it?

Mr. HILL. I did not say so. On the contrary, I have previously said that I take it for granted that the companies have been acting under this act.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Now the Senator, who is so very careful about taking nothing for granted, had better not take that, because the companies have not got a cent under that act.

Mr. HILL. They have accepted the act, and therefore have got their rights under it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I should be glad to see the proof that they have accepted it. They have not got the money, and that is all the act says.

Mr. HILL. There is no proof that shows that they have accepted any act. If the Executive Department has not done its duty, then under the position of my friend from Ohio the companies ought to apply for a mandamus. I say the right became complete upon the passage of the act and its acceptance by the companies.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Yes; but the difficulty about the Senator's argument is, whatever there is of it, and I will express no opinion about that—

Mr. HILL. It makes no difference what the Senator's opinion is about it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The difficulty about it is that according to his previous proposition these acts do not become contracts or authorized contracts in any effective sense until they are accepted by the other side; it takes two minds. A corporation can only act, not by the general force of nature, but by some corporate performance. Now, then, if the Senator will only look at the published reports officially made to us, he will see in the reports and the evidence that none of the money mentioned in the act of 1871 has been paid to any of the companies; it is in the Treasury still. Therefore, the payment of the money does not raise any implication that the company has accepted this new contract. Where, then, does the Senator get the authority to say that this new contract, as he calls it, is binding, and therefore prevents our amending the act of 1864?

Mr. HILL. I have no evidence that any act passed in relation to these companies has been accepted.

Mr. EDMUNDS. If the Senator will look into the reports, he will find it.

Mr. HILL. I have no evidence myself that the acts of 1862 and 1864 have been accepted. I understand they have been, and as those acts are all published and there has been no protest against them I assume that they have been accepted, and as it was for the benefit of the companies and not their injury, a formal acceptance was not necessary. I take it for granted they have accepted them. If the act of 1871 passed and they accepted it by acting on it, the right became perfect, whether the Secretary of the Treasury paid the money or not.

Now, the Senator from Vermont wants to get to the point that the Secretary of the Treasury must pay the money. If there had been a condition of this grant which made the Secretary of the Treasury the judge as to whether he should pay it, then I grant your position; but as there is no condition to the grant, as the act is absolute and unconditional and without reservation, all that is necessary to make it a contract is for the companies to accept it; and indeed a formal acceptance is not necessary as it is for their benefit. Of course I admit that if the companies have not accepted it or rejected it, it is no contract. An act of Congress is never a contract per se. Sometimes it is called so, and in common parlance sometimes spoken of as such; but no lawyer when he comes down to technically correct language would call an act of Congress a contract. It is an element of it of course.

But I go on to another point. Even if the general reservation to alter and repeal applied to the contract and its terms, then I say it cannot be used to take away a specific gift or provision, but only to aid such specific grant. I call the attention of the lawyers of the Senate to this position. The reservation is general; the grant of the authority to make the loan is specific. Mr. Sedgwick says:

But a particular thing given by the preceding part of a statute shall not be taken away or altered by any subsequent general words.—Sedgwick on Statutes, pages 60, 61.

I say these words "to alter, amend, or repeal" cannot be used to destroy any specific stipulation. There is one case in which the repeal may be, and that is where the object of the grant is not carried out, where there is a forfeiture of the charter; but while the companies comply with the contract, while they on their part comply with the specific stipulations, Congress cannot under the general power of reservation negative or destroy a specific grant. The Senator from Indiana [Mr. McDONALD] laid down the direct reverse of that proposition the other day, and he will find on examination of the authorities that he is incorrect.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I do not wish to interrupt the Senator to his annoyance at all, but I desire to ask him a question with his permission.

Mr. HILL. Certainly.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I am interested in the observations of the Senator, and wish to get at precisely what he means. Do I understand him to mean on this last point he has advanced, that if Congress grant a charter for a particular national bank, to be called the National Bank of North America in the District of Columbia, for twenty years, and that bank accepts the charter and complies with every provision in it, there being at the end a section which says Congress may repeal this act at any time, Congress cannot repeal it within the twenty years unless the company have violated some of the provisions of the charter?

Mr. HILL. That is just exactly my position.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Then I understand the Senator.

Mr. HILL. And I state it precisely in the language, almost, of Chief-Justice Shaw, of Massachusetts.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Not applied to any such subject as that.

Mr. HILL. But he says that these reservations to alter, amend, and repeal, though unlimited in terms, are not unlimited in effect, and one of the limitations is that they must be used to effectuate the original purpose. That is what it is done for. The history of this reservation shows that that is exactly why it was made. The courts had decided that where a charter was once granted it could not be revoked, even though they did not comply with the terms; you had to go to the courts to get a judgment of forfeiture. These reservations are made to meet that difficulty; and I need not stop here to discuss it; but I do say to the Senator from Vermont, although that is not material to this discussion, whenever this question comes to be firmly and finally settled—and the courts are now struggling with it—wherever a corporate charter or privilege has been specifically granted and accepted and the company is complying with it in good faith, the power to repeal does not authorize its destruction, and you can use that power to repeal only to carry out the original purposes of the grant. If the companies, for instance, did not build this road, if they did not keep it up, if they did not accomplish the object the United States had in granting them the franchise, then the United States reserved the right to take back the franchise and give it to persons who would carry out the object. That is the purpose of it exactly.

Mr. CHRISTIANCY. Or refuse to give it to anybody?

Mr. HILL. Certainly; or refuse to give it to anybody.

Mr. CHRISTIANCY. I can see how amendments might be made to the charter for the purpose of carrying out the original purposes of the charter; but when you come to repealing it, it seems to me that is a very different thing.

Mr. HILL. I have just stated it. I can give the case to the Senator again. Suppose the company does not build the road; suppose the company does not keep up the road.

Mr. CHRISTIANCY. The original purpose of the grant.

Mr. HILL. That is it. What is the original purpose of the grant? The original purpose of the grant was to construct the road and keep it up.

Mr. CHRISTIANCY. How will repeal do that?

Mr. HILL. The repeal and giving the right to somebody else would do it. This is not original with me; it is stated in the books. The very purpose of this reservation is to enable Congress to keep it within its power to complete the purposes of the grant; and if it had selected an unfortunate grantee in the first place, one who does not carry out the power, then Congress may revoke the grant and grant it to another, or not grant it at all if it abandons the purpose. But I do say, and I am not going to shrink from it, because the courts have said so, that, though this reservation be unlimited in terms, you cannot construe it to destroy the rights of the company as long as they are faithful to the purposes of the grant.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Has the Senator any case in mind in which any supreme court of any State or country has decided that in such a case as he has been supposing and as I have supposed, an out-and-out repeal of the charter would be unconstitutional?

Mr. HILL. No, sir.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I should think not.

Mr. HILL. Simply because I never knew a Legislature that would do it where other parties were complying with the terms. Therefore that case has never been made. But I will tell the Senator what I have seen. I have not the case here before me, but one of the best decisions ever made upon the meaning of these words to alter, amend, or repeal, and the extent to which the power goes, was made by Chief-Justice Shaw under this very kind of language, the unlimited language used in Massachusetts.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That was the fish-way case.

Mr. HILL. And he says that the object is to secure the original purpose of the grant.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That was the fish-way case.

Mr. HILL. I do not remember the name of it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Has the Senator seen the latest decision of Chief-Justice Shaw in the insurance case where the Legislature provided that an insurance company should accumulate a sinking fund to pay its debts, and which he held was lawful legislation?

Mr. HILL. Certainly; I can understand that.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Very well.

Mr. HILL. It stands upon a different principle altogether.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Then the Senator ought to understand this.

Mr. HILL. To be sure; and I do. Perhaps the Senator from Vermont is not as wise as he imagines.

Mr. EDMUNDS. No, I presume not.

Mr. HILL. If he is all-wise, some of the courts are not and some of the highest judges in this country. I am not at all intimidated when I stand before these lawyers of the committee, when I heard one of them here the other day say that no lawyer in the Dartmouth College case ever made such and such a declaration. And I say that when learned members of the Judiciary Committee come in here, learned and able as they are, and tell me that in this country, under a Government of limitations upon its powers, there is a right to impair the obligation of a contract, I am not prepared to concede that they are infinitely wise, though they be wiser than I.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The Senator will give me leave to suggest to him that I was not expressing any opinion of my own; I was only asking him, as he had referred to a decision of Chief-Justice Shaw in respect of the fish-way case, what view he took of the later decision of the same court respecting the insurance case, where the Legislature had required the accumulation of a sinking fund to pay its debts.

Mr. HILL. Certainly, and I can perfectly understand that, but I do not wish to stop now to argue it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Very well.

Mr. HILL. But there is a broad difference between an insurance case and a contract of loan to a railroad corporation; a very broad difference. The very object and terms and conditions of the creation of an insurance company are that it shall be safe for the people to take risks in. That is the very object of a grant to an insurance company, that it shall be safe to the people, and the Government is but effectuating its object and carrying out the purpose of the grant to an insurance company when it sees to it that it makes it perfectly secure for the people to insure in. The business of an insurance company is to take risks; the business of a railroad corporation is not to take risks upon life or fire either.

Mr. EDMUNDS. But is it not its business to pay its debts that the law authorized it to contract?

Mr. HILL. Certainly, according to the terms of the contract; certainly, when the debt is due.

Mr. EATON. Just what the insurance company did not do.

Mr. HILL. Precisely, for the insurance company stands on a wholly different principle. The very purpose of incorporating it is to enable it to take risks, and it is the duty of the Government to see that it is safe for the people to insure in it. This is a different thing.

Mr. BAILEY. May I ask the Senator is it not also the duty of the railroad company so to manage its affairs that it may be able to perform the functions for which it was organized?

Mr. HILL. Yes, sir.

Mr. BAILEY. And remain in a state of solvency and preserve its railroad to the corporation?

Mr. HILL. Certainly; and does anybody allege here that this corporation is not doing this? Does anybody here allege that this corporation is not keeping up the road?

Mr. BAILEY. Does not the direction of the road in its communication to the Judiciary Committee state that unless there shall be a sinking fund this corporation will become insolvent and the road will pass into other hands?

Mr. HILL. Supposing it does; is that insolvency to result from the administration of the road or from the natural course of events and the natural shrinkage of property? The debtor is not responsible for natural shrinkage in the value of his property. He is not responsible for misfortunes; he is only responsible for default. If this company will say that by reason of their management they are destroying the corporation, that its insolvency is resulting from their maladministration, I can concede the case, because then there is default.

Mr. BAILEY. Permit me to ask another question. Does not the company avow that it is distributing from year to year its assets, its income or net earnings, and that that course of procedure will bring about the very condition which it predicts in the future?

Mr. HILL. I do not know what the companies have said nor do I care; but I do say that, if the companies are paying their debts as they fall due, and paying the interest as it falls due, and keeping up the road and operating the road justly, they have a right to the dividends, because the eighteenth section of the charter says so; but, because the mortgagee is insolvent and because the property mortgaged is insufficient to pay the debt, that does not give the creditor a right to the earnings before his debt is due. I admit and contend that the earnings uncollected when this debt falls due the court may seize and apply to the debt; but I defy the Senator to find a case where there is no default or maladministration where a debtor is compelled to apply the income of the property to the payment of his debt before the debt falls due.

But this view can be made still stronger. If under the general reservation to alter or amend Congress retained the power to change or annul the specific terms of the contract, then Congress has reserved the power to commit a fraud on the companies, and this cannot be true. Now, I put it to the Senate, I put it to my friend the able Senator from Michigan, a man whose mind is so able and whose heart is so just, why did the Government agree to these liberal terms with the companies?

Mr. CHRISTIANCY. I will answer, if the Senator will allow me, exactly why they agreed to them: because they reserved all the power they ever had and parted with none of it.

Mr. HILL. Then I understand the Senator to say that the Government agreed with the companies, "If you will take the risk, undergo the labor, and build a road which the Government desires built, which is important to the integrity of the Union, which is important for the uses of the Government, and the Government therefore needs that road; if you gentlemen will go forward and build this road, we will advance you so much money and we will not require you to pay that money back for thirty years, except half transportation and 5 per cent. of the net earnings;" and I understand the Senator to say that, when the Government said that to the companies as an inducement for them to take the contract and build the road, the moment the road is built the Government can take back the inducement. Do I understand any man to say that?

Mr. CHRISTIANCY. I understand that the Government understood and that the corporators understood that their rights under such a reservation of power would rest upon the sound discretion of Congress, and I see no absurdity in any man trusting to that sound discretion of Congress.

Mr. HILL. Mr. President, if the subject had been bound to trust to the discretion of a legislative body, our fathers acted unwisely when they declared independence of Great Britain, who asserted the right to levy a tax but would not do it. Sir, the Revolution was fought upon the assertion of a power, and not solely upon the manner of its exercise; and I put it to the Senator, and I put it to the Senate, when this contract was made and the Government agreed to take only one-half the transportation to apply to the interest before the maturity of the bonds, was it not an inducement to the companies to build the road? When they actually built the road, have you a right to take the whole compensation away from them? That is the point. You say "trust to the discretion of Congress!"

Mr. BECK. Will the Senator allow me? I do not desire to interrupt the Senator but I wish to have information. In the case of Miller vs. The State, 15 Wallace's Reports, the court say:

Power to legislate, founded upon such a reservation in a charter to a private corporation, is certainly not without limit, and it may well be admitted that it cannot be exercised to take away or destroy rights acquired by virtue of such a charter, and which, by a legitimate use of the powers granted have become vested in the corporation, but it may be safely affirmed that the reserved power may be exercised, and to almost any extent, to carry into effect the original purposes of the grant.

Mr. HILL. Exactly.

Mr. BECK. "Or to secure the due administration of its affairs."

Mr. HILL. Certainly.

Mr. BECK. "So as to protect the rights of the stockholders and of creditors, and for the proper disposition of the assets."

Mr. HILL. Certainly.

Mr. BECK. Now the question I desire to ask is what is there in the bill of the Judiciary Committee that goes beyond the authority asserted in this opinion that may be exercised for the purpose of protecting the rights of the creditors of the companies?

Mr. HILL. I will tell the Senator. Those words are used in that book according to their legal signification. Now, then, the Government has no right to interfere to protect creditors except where there is a default of the debtor; then there must be "a proper disposition of the assets."

Mr. BECK. Under the authority reserved to alter, amend, or change, which was a part of the grant of course, if the power is as comprehensive as this opinion says, and if it is admitted that the companies are not only looking to insolvency but so far dividing the earnings as to become certainly insolvent when this debt matures, under the decision of the Supreme Court which I have just read, is it not certain that Congress not only has the power but ought to protect the creditors against that probability?

Mr. HILL. Whenever the creditors need protection and whenever protection is extended according to the contract. That is what it means. It says "proper," that is according to the rights of both parties. You cannot protect the creditor by destroying the rights of the debtor. It does not mean that the creditor shall have protection against a bad contract by making it a good one. He is entitled to protection according to his contract, against default or breaches by the debtor.

Mr. BECK. The great object in making the loan by the Government was to have this road perpetually held by the corporation for their use. Now if that be true, and if the companies show themselves that in the near future they will be certainly insolvent, that the road will be sold out and bought in by other people who will be under no such obligation and thereby the Government will not have the perpetual use of it and the Government will not get its money, either its principal or interest, unless there is some means taken to so regulate the administration of the road as to protect the creditors of the companies, have we not a right to resort to such means?

Mr. HILL. I will say to the Senator that may be all true, but you cannot protect the creditors by denying the stockholders or the owners of the road as the debtors the rights they are entitled to. You must protect the creditor by proper means; you must protect the creditor by such means as the existing law authorizes, as existing remedies permit. You cannot resort to extraordinary remedies; you cannot violate the charter; you cannot protect the creditor by destroying the rights of the debtor. You must do it in a way that is consistent with the original purposes of the charter. This bill does not allege the acts the Senator states. It does not allege the companies are doing anything to lessen the value of the security the Government agreed to take. Show me that the companies are doing such wrongs and I will show ample remedies. Even other purchasers would get no new rights other than the charter.

Mr. BECK. The original purpose of the charter was to secure a perpetual road; another was to pay the debt of the companies; another purpose was of course to protect the stockholders; but those stockholders have no rights until the debts are paid; and if the administration are dividing out the assets of the road to stockholders, to the absolute, certain destruction of the debts of the companies and the rights of the Government, ought we not to interfere by legislation before they go further?

Mr. HILL. The Senator will see the mistake he has made. He says the stockholders have no rights until the creditors are paid.

Mr. BECK. No ultimate rights.

Mr. HILL. They have immediate rights. They have a right by the very terms of the charter to 10 per cent. dividends.

Mr. BECK. I mean that to the ultimate profits they have no right, and therefore they can destroy the security by the course I have indicated.

Mr. HILL. If they are doing anything to destroy the security, if the destruction of the security is the result of their act, all right; then they are in default and then you can take the road out of their hands and put it in the hands of a receiver for the protection of the creditors, if you want to. That is all that case is; it is all any case is. If there is default, then the thing can be done; but I tell the Senator there is no case on earth where the proper protection of the creditor means anything but always the proper discharge of the duties of the debtor; and this contract, which says they are entitled to the 10 per cent., was made with the distinct knowledge of the fact that the road might be insolvent before the debt became due. The power to alter was reserved; but it must be resorted to so as not to impair or destroy vested rights.

Mr. BECK. I ask the Senator what part of the bill of the Judiciary Committee destroys any vested right?

Mr. HILL. It destroys a vested right in this: it distinctly provides that they shall pay 25 per cent. of the net earnings instead of 5; it distinctly provides that they shall pay the Government the whole of the Government transportation instead of half, and the charter distinctly said they should not pay but 5 per cent. net earnings, and the charter distinctly stipulated that they should not be required to pay but half the Government transportation. Now, take the law as you find it, make any act you please to carry out the original purpose of the charter, to protect the creditors from the wrong of the debtor, but do not protect the creditor because the creditor made a bad contract. There is no such law as that. You are proposing to protect the creditor because he made a bad contract at first; you are not proposing to protect the creditor against any maladministration of the debtor. Nobody alleges that it is the bad management of the road that is bringing about this result; it is the mere opinion of the natural course of events. I take this occasion to say that for myself I think the road is worth the money or will be in thirty years or by the time these bonds are due; but that is a mere matter of opinion. You would have no right to take charge of a corporation and administer its assets because twenty years hereafter it may be in default. It is an absurdity.

Again, the rule is distinctly laid down that the conditions or reservations in a contract "which are repugnant to the grant or gift by which they are created or to which they are annexed are void." (2d Story's Equity Jurisprudence, section 1304.) If the reservation would be void if literally repugnant, much less can you put a construction on the reservation which would make it repugnant. Now, you put a construction on this right reserved which negatives a specific right granted in the charter. The law is that if the reservation literally meant that, it would be void; and now you seek to put a construction on it to make it mean that. That you cannot do.

Still again, you cannot use or construe this reservation to "alter, amend, and repeal" so as to defeat or annul the known meaning or understanding of the parties at the time the contract was made; and upon this subject I have authorities here from Judge Kent that are very explicit and clear.

Judge Kent, after citing Bacon's rule, says:

The modern and more reasonable practice is to give to the language its just sense and to search for the precise meaning and one requisite to give due and fair effect to the contract without adopting either the rule of a rigid or of even indulgent construction. * * * The true principle of sound ethics is to give the contract the sense in which the person making the promise believed the other party to have accepted it, if he in fact did so understand and accept it.—2 Kent's Com., 556, 557.

That is also the rule of construction of treaties, says Vattel.

The mutual intention of the parties to the instrument is the great and sometimes the difficult object of inquiry when the terms of it are not free from ambiguity. To reach and carry that intention into effect the law when it becomes necessary will control even the literal terms of the contract, if they manifestly contravene the purpose; and many cases are given in the books in which the plain intent has prevailed over the strict letter of the contract.—2 Kent, 555.

Now I put to every Senator here, when these debtors accepted this charter with a distinct stipulation that the Government, until the maturity of the bonds, would not exact from them anything in payment but half the Government transportation and 5 per cent net earnings, was it understood by either party that the Government should change that and exact all or exact more? For if you have power to exact more you have power to exact all. How did the companies understand it? How did the Government say they understood it? How have the Supreme Court decided they understood it? They understood it according to its very language. That is the way they took it. Now for you to exert a general power of reservation to destroy the sense of a specific grant, to destroy the sense in which both parties understood it, in which especially the debtor understood it—to exert that general power to destroy that specific grant on that specific stipulation, is a fraud in law, say the books, and you have no power to do it. I admit the full force of the decision read by the Senator from Kentucky, and I wish the Senator from Vermont had heard it. It shows that the reservation of the power to alter, amend, or repeal is to be used to effectuate the original purpose of the grant.

Chancellor Kent continues:

So the mutual intention of the parties to the instrument is the great and sometimes the difficult object of inquiry when the terms of it are not free from ambiguity, and to reach and carry that intention into effect, the law, when it becomes necessary, will control the literal terms of the contract, and if manifestly the contrary is the purpose, and many cases are given in the books in which the plain intent has prevailed over the strict letter of the contract.

Why? Because if you induce a man to undertake a risk, to perform a labor under a promise which was specifically given that he shall reap certain rewards, and after he has performed the labor and taken the risk, for you, under your reservation of a general power which means to carry out the original purpose, destroy that specific grant, you commit a fraud. See what an absurdity. Here the Supreme Court has decided that under this contract no interest is to be paid except the 5 per cent. of the net earnings until the maturity of the debt. Now, you come in here by legislative power, contrary to the adjudicated intention of the parties, (for the Supreme Court of the United States in their decision adjudicated the original intention and understanding,) and attempt to unsettle the adjudication by declaring that in some form an amount shall be paid more than was stipulated. The Supreme Court say the original intention of the parties was that nothing but half transportation and 5 per cent. should be paid. Here Kent says, you cannot by a general reservation alter the original intention, you must carry out that original intention and understanding of the parties, and you by this very bill seek to defeat and destroy that original intention.

In his able argument the Senator from Michigan [Mr. CHRISTIANCY] said in substance that it was no argument against the existence of this power to show it might be injudiciously used. So I tell that Senator it is no argument in favor of the existence of the power to show it might be wisely or even usefully used. If the power does not exist it cannot be used either wisely or unwisely.

If Congress can change this contract in any respect it can change it in all respects. If this general reservation to alter or amend gives Congress power to compel the payment of one dollar more than the stipulations require before the maturity of the bonds, then Congress can require every dollar to be paid before maturity.

Can Congress by legislation declare that the interest shall be more than 6 per cent? I ask the Senator from Kentucky that question. The original act declares that the interest shall be 6 per cent. Can Congress now by virtue of its reserved power alter that interest and say it shall be 8 per cent on 10 per cent? Can it declare that the bonds shall be due now? The original contract said the bonds should be due in thirty years and the debt should be paid at the maturity of the bonds. Can you under this power to alter or amend declare that the bonds shall be due to-morrow? If you have the power to declare that the whole transportation shall be paid when the contract requires that only one-half shall be paid, then you have power to declare that the interest shall be 10 per cent. though the contract says 6; then you have the power to declare that the bonds shall be due to-morrow though the contract says they shall be due in thirty years from their date.

But I appeal to gentlemen on another point, and I wish they would answer the question: Can Congress repeal the act of 1864 and reinstate the first lien of the Government bonds? If so, that is what you ought to do. If the position occupied by the gentlemen of the Judiciary Committee, an able committee I concede, is true, as one of them intimates, that the act of 1864 was a fraud—one of them has intimated even that it was the result of bribery—if that be true, why not repeal the act of 1864?

Mr. CHRISTIANCY. The rights of third persons would be affected.

Mr. HILL. The bondholders are not third persons. The bondholders took under that act; the bondholders took with notice of that act. That act was part of their rights. Now, when the bondholder took his bond, he took it with notice in the law that Congress had a right to change the lien that was given in his bond. That is what you say you cannot get rid of. Everybody who takes that bond takes it with notice of that law; he takes it with notice that there is power to alter, amend, or repeal; and if you have power to alter, amend, or repeal anything in that act, you have a right to repeal it all, and I put it to the Senator, can you now repeal the act of 1864 and reinstate the first lien of the Government debt? You can if you can do what you propose here. If you can change the contract in one respect you can change it in all. If you can say that the whole transportation shall be paid when the contract said only half, you can say that the first lien, which was given by the act of 1862 and subordinated to other bonds by the act of 1864, can be reinstated, because every man that bought these bonds purchased them with notice of the law, with the law before him; and if the construction the gentlemen put on the law be correct, he buys it with distinct notice that his bond may be destroyed to-morrow. It is perfectly legitimate to say that you have not the power when the power is absurd. You cannot escape the argument that if you have power to change in one respect you have power to change in all. You reserved the power in the act of 1864 to repeal that act; now let any lawyer answer me, will the repeal reinstate the first lien of the Government bonds?

Mr. CHRISTIANCY. No man says that it would.

Mr. HILL. I say it is so if the other position is correct, and you cannot show the difference. The bonds may be in the hands of the stockholders; the bonds may be in the hands of the corporation; I cannot tell. I do not care where they are; whoever took them took them with notice of the law; and on the terms of the law if you can change the contract in one respect by reason of that reservation, you can change it in all. If you can change it in all, you can change it in any. You must abide the contract or not.

Mr. BECK. The act of 1864 gives the right to alter, amend, and repeal. In your mind that is an absolute nullity on that position.

Mr. HILL. I say those words apply to the exercise of the corporate franchise; but they are an absolute nullity as applied to the contract. The Senate does not understand me. I have already made a long argument to show that the words "alter, amend, or repeal," retain the power to the Government to see that the original purpose of the charter is carried out.

Mr. BECK. And one purpose is, of course, to protect the creditors; and now you say we have no power to protect them, although the management of the corporation may come and admit that they intend to make it impossible to pay its debts. The Senator's position is that under the power to alter, amend, or repeal we have no right to require any security of the corporation.

Mr. HILL. I am not aware that this body acts on assertion. The Judiciary Committee has not informed us that the company said they intend to make the property insolvent. Show me that, and put your bill on that ground.

Mr. BECK. They have proved by the treasurer of the company himself that that would be the effect.

Mr. HILL. Then I ask the Senate to amend the bill and put this legislation on that ground. But I tell the Senator, if that is true, his remedy is not here. That decision says "by proper means the creditor shall be protected." If it be true that these corporations are using the property for the purpose of destroying its value, for the purpose of preventing the collection of its debts, I tell you you have got an ample remedy. Go into the courts and the courts will restrain them, and the courts will require them to give an additional security. What I am arguing against is this monstrous claim of legislative power to exercise judicial functions. There is no trouble about protecting creditors. I admit the creditors are entitled to protection. The Senator is wrong when he says I deny that. I admit it, but it is protection known to the law; it is protection given according to the forms and rules of law under the remedies provided by law, and not by the exertion of an extraordinary legislative power.

If Congress can do what is proposed, it can do all these things; if it cannot do all these things, it can do none of them. Mr. President, take it as you please, this is the most remarkable bill that has ever been introduced into a legislative body, and I say it with profound respect for the distinguished members of the Judiciary Committee. I believe the doctrine I am laying down here to-day will be sustained thoroughly by the Supreme Court if you pass this bill. I have come to the conclusions I have announced contrary to my will. I took it for granted that I should vote with the Judiciary Committee; I took it for granted that they were correct in their construction of power until the discussion sprang up and I got possession of the question and investigated it for myself. I do say with all due deference to that committee that this bill asserts a most monstrous power. What do you propose to do? Why, sir, speaking in the language of a lawyer, this is a bill filed in a legislative body to construe the contract. How? By declaring the words "net earnings" shall mean what the legislative will shall declare them to mean and not what the law says they do mean.

Mr. CHRISTIANCY. Will the Senator allow me?

Mr. HILL. Yes, if I am wrong.

Mr. CHRISTIANCY. The committee have not by the bill endeavored to define what "net earnings" mean under the original law at all.

Mr. HILL. Certainly.

Mr. CHRISTIANCY. They have simply provided what they shall mean hereafter.

Mr. HILL. That is exactly what I understand. It is claimed by the Senator from Ohio that here is an existing contract where the words "net earnings" are used, and that you can by legislation after that contract was made give a new meaning to the words. That is the proposition.

Mr. CHRISTIANCY. We can amend the law.

Mr. HILL. Amend and destroy.

Mr. SARGENT. A case is now pending in the Supreme Court, brought in obedience to legislation of Congress, for the Supreme Court to define what "net earnings" mean, and this bill simply provides that this decision or definition of the Supreme Court shall apply to matters heretofore, but hereafter the will of Congress shall be substituted for the rule the Supreme Court shall lay down.

Mr. CHRISTIANCY. But under the power of amendment we require them to proceed hereafter on the basis fixed by law.

Mr. HILL. Precisely; that you can provide by the legislative will that hereafter net earnings shall mean gross earnings. You cannot do that. That is the power claimed. There is no escape from it. Will you tell me that the legislature can legislate absurdity into truth? And yet, if your position is true that you have the right to declare what "net earnings" shall be in the future and that you shall give to these words a meaning which the law never heretofore gave them, and which was not the meaning when the parties agreed to these words, you declare that you have a right to say that "net earnings" shall hereafter mean gross earnings. That is your bill.

This is not only a bill to construe the words not according to the meaning the words have by law and in the lexicons, but what the legislative will shall say they ought to have; but it is, in the second place, a bill filed to reform the contract by inserting in it not what the parties intended, but what Congress now wills shall be the contract.

Mr. CHRISTIANCY. Under the power to amend.

Mr. HILL. Ah! The decision read by the Senator from Kentucky, which I am glad he read—a wise decision—says that the power to alter and amend must be exercised to carry out the original purpose, and not to destroy it.

Mr. CHRISTIANCY. That is only one of them.

Mr. HILL. And to do everything in accordance with the laws of the land in the protection of the rights of all companies and creditors. But you are doing now what is a destruction of the contract. If you have a right to say now that you can reform the contract by an act of Congress, why can you not repeal the act of 1864 and reinstate the first lien of the Government bonds? You say you cannot do that. Why? Where is the limitation, and why can you do one and not the other? Why can you not say the companies shall pay 10 per cent. interest instead of 6? Why can you not say they shall pay 50 per cent.? You say you have the power to do it. If you can change the meaning of words, if you can change legal definitions, if you can make a new contract, not according to the intention of the parties when the old contract was made, but you can make a contract according to your will now, what is it you cannot do? There is no pretense that anything was omitted which the parties intended to insert or that anything was inserted which was agreed to be omitted; and yet you bring into this legislative body a bill to reform a contract and make a new one, and you give no earthly reason for it but that you made a bad bargain and now you want to make a good one. The one you made by consent and agreement you say is a bad one, and you will make another by your own act without consent or agreement.

Again, it is a bill filed to foreclose a mortgage before the mortgagee is in default, and to collect the debts of other mortgagees without their request or authority and without their foreclosure in the courts. Here is a remarkable provision of this bill of the Judiciary Committee. These other mortgages of the companies, of course, have to be foreclosed in the ordinary way, if the companies shall be in default when they are due; but you propose to command these companies to pay money into your Treasury, and which money shall be paid to these bondholders when they become due without a foreclosure; that is, you assert not only your own rights and the rights of others, but relieve the other mortgagees of the obligation to foreclose their mortgages according to the law and the contract.

Then, again, it is a common-law action of debt to collect a debt before it is due. It is a bill, I repeat, to make the acts of the debtors crimes, which acts the contract stipulated they might do and which were offered them as inducements to make the contract. Sir, I affirm that the legislature of England in the time of James I never asserted a more absolute power. Here certain things that these corporations might do were provided for in the charter; you stipulated that they might do them; and now you come in by this bill and propose to make it a crime if they do them! Was such a monstrous power ever heard of to be exercised by legislators? Surely, if this be true, the legislative power of this body is indeed omnipotent.

In plain language, I repeat what I have said: it is a bill to make a good contract without agreement solely because the Government apprehends it made a bad contract by agreement, and after the chief inducements to the Government to make the contract have been fully realized.

It is a bill which can find no precedent in the courts of law, no authority in the powers of legislation, and—I say it respectfully—in my judgment, no justification in the forum of conscience.

Mr. President, fortunately for me I was not here when this contract was made. I had no agency in it nor connection with it. I am not going to visit criticism upon those who did make it. I can see one marked difference between the temper of the gentlemen here now and those who were here then when this contract was made. I see the great purpose of the Government then was to get the roads constructed. The great purpose of the Government was to link together the Union, to get cheap transportation and keep up those works, and it was said over and over that the Government to do that was willing to make this loan, even if it lost it. Now the road is built, now the road is kept up, now the labor and the risk have been taken, now the Government has accomplished its great object, now the Union is saved and bound together by bonds of iron from sea to sea, now all this is done, suddenly there wakes up a new spirit to say that the whole principle of the loan shall be changed. Precedents are to be disregarded, courts are to be abandoned, and rights are to be trampled upon, powers unknown to the British Parliament in its most omnipotent days are to be exercised, and acts, just in themselves, are denounced as crimes, to enable you to collect your debt before it is due. Fortunately for me, I have no prejudices pro or con; I regard myself in this matter as a judge; but, if I should exhibit the passion and temper against these corporations that some gentlemen have exhibited on this floor, I should think I was not a proper judge. I should be afraid that I was acting under some influence of bias or prejudice. Sir, if the Government has made a bad contract so far as the money venture is concerned, let it abide that contract.

I do not share the apprehensions which some gentlemen have uttered on this floor of danger from these corporations. The learned Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN] said if we did not govern these corporations the corporations would soon govern the country. I have no apprehension of that kind. The Senator from North Carolina [Mr. MERRIMON] also pursued that line of argument. The idea that a few moneyed corporations are to govern this country! Sir, is there no power to control these corporations? I concede that under this reservation you have the power to control these corporations in the exercise of the franchises; you have the power to preserve the road; you have the power to keep up the road; you have the power to regulate the freights; you have the power under the act and the decisions of the courts to protect the people from unjust oppression. All these things you can do; but it does not follow that you can make a new contract, that you can break an old contract, and that you can collect your money before it is due, or that you can take steps against a debtor unknown to the courts of any civilized country.

Sir, you can control these corporations; you have power to control them; the interest of the country will control them; the natural loss of trade will control them; competition will affect them. There are a thousand agencies at work that will control these corporations, and I tell you this great Government with its forty-five million people will not become a sick and fainting Caesar to cry to these corporations "Give me some drink, Titinius!"

But while I have no fear that these moneyed corporations are going to subjugate this great Government, I have a fear, I do dread the principle asserted in this bill, which is to give Congress a perpetual right of interference with these companies. If you have a right to pass this bill, you have a right to change your notions next session, and pass another, and the next session to pass another, and the next session to pass another, and so with all bills in relation to the contract. If you find at the next session that you think the money you ought to have paid into the sinking fund is not enough to secure the debt, then you will pass a bill to get more, and what is the result? You keep these companies constantly in legislative litigation; you keep them constantly uneasy, you keep them constantly paralyzed; you keep them constantly interested in coming here to control legislation. Sir, I tell you, if you would stop the evils of which you complain, take these companies out of Congress, take these companies out of politics; do not make it the interest of these companies to have an active part in every presidential and congressional election; do not subject the companies to keep agents here at every session of Congress to watch and prevent interference by Congress with their rights.

My reflections lead me strongly to the conclusion that the best way to secure your debt, the best way to relieve the country of the scandals connected with these corporations, is to say to them, "Go, keep your contract; operate your roads just as you contracted; keep up your work, fulfill your contract in all respects, and pay your debts when they become due, and Congress will not interfere with you. Do not be afraid of Congress as long as you keep your contracts." Whenever they do not do it, then you have the power to interfere. I concede it; but you cannot administer relief in anticipation of default; you must wait till the default comes. That is the power you have over them. They will know that if they violate the charter, if they get extravagant, if they are not just to the people, then you will step in and interfere; but you do not put this bill on this ground. If the Judiciary Committee would put this bill upon the ground of default in the companies in any sense, of malfeasance by the companies, of maladministration by the companies, I would yield, except to say that as to this loan the proper remedy would be in the courts, but I would admit there ought to be some interference either by the courts or by the Legislature; but so far as the franchises are concerned, if they do not execute them, you have a right to interfere by legislation, and you have that power always. That is the power you have; that is the power you intended to have.

Sir, there is another thing I dread in addition to this perpetual interference of Congress with these corporations—the very source of infinite scandal if you do not get rid of it. I am for non-intervention until the contract is violated; then I am for intervention, and upon the ground of the violation of the contract. But this I dread. It looks like a will on the part of the Government to repudiate its contracts. Sir, if there is any influence in this country that is more demoralizing than another, it is the idea that has gone abroad that shows a weakening in the sense of obligation of contracts. If the Government would have the people be faithful to their contracts, let the Government be faithful to its own; but if the Government has made a bad contract, so long as the contractor complies with the terms of that contract, abide by it. It is better to submit to a wrong than to do a wrong; it is better to lose money than to exercise an ungranted power, a doubtful power. It is better to lose your interest than to keep up a perpetual congressional interference with these railroad companies and compel them to come here, subjected to the necessity by your action of pandering to cupidity to avert the oppression of power. You drive them into the courts and you are yourselves weakening the corporations by exhausting the fund in useless litigation which ought to be accumulated for the debt. You have already sent these companies to the courts before and the courts have decided against you. You are constantly proposing to send these companies to the courts with new expenses to be incurred, and yet you complain that the companies are likely to be insolvent. Sir, if this system of perpetual interference by Congress is to continue you will work their insolvency.

But, sir, I have said I do not dread these corporations as instruments of power to destroy this country, because there are a thousand agencies which can regulate, restrain, and control them; but there is a corporation we may all well dread. That corporation is the Federal Government. From the aggressions of this corporation there can be no safety, if it be allowed to go beyond the well-defined limits of its power. I dread nothing so much as the exercise of ungranted and doubtful powers by this Government. It is in my opinion the danger of dangers to the future of this country. Let us be sure we keep it always within its limits. If this great, ambitious, ever-growing corporation become oppressive, who shall check it? If it become wayward, who shall control it? If it become unjust, who shall trust it? As sentinels on the country's watch-tower, Senators, I beseech you watch and guard with sleepless dread that corporation which can make all property and rights, all States and people, and all liberty and hope its playthings in an hour, and its victims forever.

Mr. THURMAN. Mr. President, before the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. BAILEY] takes the floor, as I understand he will do, to speak on this bill when it comes up to-morrow, I wish to make a few, a very few observations.

Mr. President, the Senator from Georgia [Mr. HILL] has indulged in some very sweeping denunciations of this bill, so sweeping that if they are true and well founded the first duty of the Senate is to disband its Judiciary Committee and appoint another. If the criticisms of the speech on the bill of that committee are true, the members of that committee who reported the bill are either idiots or villains. I do not think they are villains, and I do not think they are idiots. One of them was a distinguished judge in his own State for many years and a more distinguished judge for almost a generation in the Supreme Court of the United States. Three other members of that committee have been chief-justices of their States; and the other three were the leading lawyers of their States when they came to this body; and all of them have been placed and continued upon the Judiciary Committee of the Senate for these many long years. They ought to know the law, and if they have reported a bill which shocks the moral sense, which violates every principle of civilized government, which is in plain antagonism to the Constitution of the country, which shocks every idea of right and justice, and which imperils the safety of the people of the United States in their contracts and their business, it is the bounden duty of this Senate to dismiss that committee and appoint better men in their stead.

Mr. President, the time will come for some one of that committee to vindicate it against these accusations. The time will come to show that in the heat of speaking a Senator can make accusations against a committee that sound judgment and calm reason cannot approve. I think that time will come before this debate is at an end, and I think when it shall come it will be found by the decision of this Senate that the committee charged with the investigation of the law by this body does know something of law and that the Government of the United States is more powerful than any corporation that can exist in the Republic.

Mr. President, so much I feel impelled to say now, for I confess, with the kindest feelings toward the Senator who has just spoken with so much earnestness and so much ability, that there were things which dropped from his mouth that wound a man who has endeavored to discharge his duty honestly and does not think himself subject to such criticisms. But it was not for the purpose of speaking on that that I rose just now. I wish once more to say that in view of the adjournment of Congress, which it is hoped is to take place sometime, and not too far in the future, and of the other measures that must occupy the attention of Congress, and of the necessity that we are under of giving way from time to time to the appropriation bills which have a claim to precedence over all other business, I must ask the Senate, and I hope it will be its pleasure, to come to a vote on this measure on Wednesday next.

Mr. HILL. Mr. President, I am not aware that I have made the slightest accusation against the Judiciary Committee or any member of it. The second time after the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] had made a slighting allusion, as I considered it, to some of my positions which I was taking from the books, I simply repelled it by an imputation that he was not perhaps wiser than the courts. That was simply a reply to the remark of the Senator from Vermont, as I understood him to intend it, nothing else. If there was anything else harsh in my speech, I am not aware of it. I made no accusation against that committee; but I have stated, and I have endeavored to give my reasons upon authority, that in my judgment the Judiciary Committee have made a mistake and have claimed for Congress the exercise of a power which it does not possess. If that is to wound, if that is to be offensive, I trust that the grand Achilles of this body will start his javelins at more worthy game than myself who have said the same thing. It seems that this Judiciary Committee or some other Judiciary Committee have made decisions heretofore in relation to these very railroad companies and their rights under these charters, and the question who was right, the Judiciary Committee or the companies, has been referred to the Supreme Court, and the Supreme Court has sustained the companies. I was not aware that it was at all offensive for a member of the Senate to differ with the Judiciary Committee on a question of legislative power. Really I did not know that it was. If that is a crime, I have committed a crime. I have committed nothing more. Homer was said to have nodded, and I am not aware that Homer or any of his disciples ever took it as offensive, as an accusation against him, that it was said that he nodded. If the great Homer nodded, the Judiciary Committee now and then may nod.

I have respect for the Senator from Ohio, very great respect for that Senator; I have respect for the Judiciary Committee, very great respect for the Judiciary Committee, but it has made a mistake, in my judgment, from my stand-point. That is my honest conviction. Am I to follow my convictions, or has this Senate not only the power to violate contracts, but has its Judiciary Committee the right to command my homage and obedience against my convictions on a mere question of power? Personal respect is unbounded; official respect is unlimited; there is no office in the gift of the people that perhaps either one of the Judiciary Committee could not fill with honor to himself and benefit to the people. Nevertheless I do enjoy, and I expect to continue to enjoy, the proud privilege of acting and speaking in this body according to my own honest convictions of what are the powers of this Government.

Mr. THURMAN. If the Judiciary Committee has ever claimed infallibility, that claim never was heard by me. That the Judiciary Committee may have committed errors in its judgment, I am as free to admit as anybody can be to assert it. That every Senator has a right to criticize the judgment of that committee, I certainly have never denied. I would assert my own right to criticize the judgment of that committee; and what I assert for myself I accord to every one else. But it did seem to me that when it is said that a measure reported by that committee—I do not pretend to use the precise words of the Senator from Georgia, but I do convey his ideas—shocked the moral sense, was a violation of the principles of all civilized government, was a flagrant violation of the Constitution of the United States, and similar expressions, it was about time for that committee, if such was the opinion of the Senate, to be disbanded or for its members to resign.

But, Mr. President, I am not very sensitive about such things; I am not quick to take offense at all. I have the highest respect for the ability and integrity of my friend from Georgia, and also for his urbane manners and disposition. I do not think, therefore, that he intended the offense, and I make very great allowance for the heat—

Mr. HILL. You need make no allowance.

Mr. THURMAN. Very well then, I will not say anything about that. But I will say once more that I do not think a measure reported by this committee twice, first two years ago and again after its personnel had been in some measure changed, deserved quite such a characterization as it has received. But let that pass. I will not take offense at all; but I will endeavor, when the proper time comes, to answer by argument, and not by assertion, by reason, and not by prejudice, the positions taken by the Senator from Georgia. I only wish now once more to repeat that I hope the Senate will come to a vote next Wednesday.

Mr. HILL. It is proper for me to say that the language to which the Senator refers, but which he does not quote, was quoted by me from Mr. Madison. He said that the power claimed to impair the obligation of contracts was in violation of the social compact and the fundamental principles of sound legislation and the charter of natural rights. That was about as strong language as I used, and I used similar language from another authority, and I am sorry that I did not state at the time more specifically where the language came from. I said that in my judgment this power claimed had no precedent in law and no justification in authority, and I do not think the Senator himself can find that such a bill was ever before brought into such a legislative body as this is; but he claims it under a special reservation, and he and I differ upon the legal question. But the strongest language I used was quoted from others, and was not original; it was the product of some of the greatest minds this country has ever produced against the enormous pretensions of a legislative body to impair or destroy the validity of a contract after that contract has been made upon any pretext.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President—

Mr. WINDOM. I believe, by unanimous consent, the appropriation bill was to be taken up at the close of the speech of the Senator from Georgia.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. MITCHELL in the chair.) That was the understanding.

Mr. WINDOM. I have no objection to the Senator from Tennessee taking the floor for to-morrow, if he desires.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Tennessee has the floor on the unfinished business to come up to-morrow. The Senate will now proceed to the consideration of the consular and diplomatic appropriation bill.

Mr. THURMAN. Does the Senator from Minnesota propose to go on with the consular bill now?

Mr. WINDOM. I understand it is before the Senate. I think if the Senate will give its attention to it for half an hour or three-quarters of an hour we can pass it.

Mr. THURMAN. Then the funding bill will be laid aside informally.

Mr. WINDOM. Informally.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It will be laid aside informally, to be the unfinished business for to-morrow.

CONSULAR AND DIPLOMATIC APPROPRIATION BILL.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. No. 3064) making appropriations for the consular and diplomatic service of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1879, and for other purposes.

Mr. WINDOM. Mr. President, I will explain in a very few words the amendments proposed by the Committee on Appropriations. The total additions to the bill amount to $100,400, and they are made up almost exclusively of the restoration of salaries now required by law and also the restoration of two or three of our missions which have been stricken out and of one or two other foreign representatives, chargés d'affaires, consuls-general, &c. The committee have also recommended the restoration of ten consuls at $1,000 each, consuls that have existed heretofore but were stricken out in 1876. I think I shall be able, if any of the Senators desire, to show the reasons for this restoration.

We have also added $10,000 to the appropriation for the relief and protection of American seamen. This sum will not be used unless it becomes necessary by some emergency when it is deemed advisable to have the money ready. The addition in that case cannot be an expenditure unless it shall be absolutely needed by the exigencies of the service.

We have reduced the bill $21,200, so that the net additions are $79,200. The reductions are one clerk to the legation at Spain $1,200, and a general appropriation for diplomatic and consular service under the direction of the President of $20,000. The committee recommend the striking out of those items, so that the total increase is $79,200.

The reason which induced the Committee on Appropriations to recommend the reinstatement of salaries is one which has been very frequently given to the Senate and as frequently received its sanction. The law fixes the salaries of our foreign representatives. This question was discussed very thoroughly two years ago and again in 1877. The attention of the Committee on Foreign Relations and Foreign Affairs of the Senate and the House of Representatives was called to the subject, and no movement, no effort has ever been made by the proper committees to procure legislation changing the law which now fixes these salaries, and the Committee on Appropriations deemed it to be their duty under these circumstances to appropriate the money required by law. That is about all there is to this bill with the exception of two or three items which I will call attention to as the reading progresses.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the bill.

Mr. WINDOM. I ask to have the amendments of the committee acted upon as we proceed; and if there be no objection I ask that the five-minute rule be applied to debate on this bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair hears no objection, and the five-minute rule is applied.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to read the bill. The first amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was in lines 10 and 11, to increase the appropriation "for salaries of envoys extraordinary and ministers plenipotentiary to Great Britain, France, Germany, and Russia," from $15,000 to $17,500 each, and to increase the total amount of the appropriation from $60,000 to $70,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in lines 14 and 15, to increase the appropriation "for salaries of envoys extraordinary and ministers plenipotentiary to Spain, Austria, Italy, Brazil, Mexico, Japan, and China" from $10,000 to $12,000 each, and to increase the total amount of the appropriation from $70,000 to $84,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in lines 17 and 18, to increase the appropriation "for salaries of envoys extraordinary and ministers plenipotentiary to Chili and Peru" from $8,000 to $10,000 each, and to increase the total amount of the appropriation from $16,000 to $20,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WINDOM. The next paragraph, lines 19, 20, and 21, the committee move to strike out. I will make an insertion afterward.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The lines proposed to be stricken out will be reported.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

For salary of envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary to the Argentine Republic and Paraguay and Uruguay, $2,000.

Mr. WINDOM. I am instructed by the committee to move to strike out that paragraph in order that we may insert afterward the mission to the Argentine Republic at $7,500, as it has heretofore existed, and also that we may reinstate the Paraguay and Uruguay appropriation, which the House had stricken out. They consolidated them. We desire to reinstate them. I move first to strike out that paragraph for the purpose of reaching the amendment that will be proposed hereafter.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Chief Clerk continued the reading of the bill.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was in line 22, after the words "resident at," to insert the words "Belgium, Netherlands;" and in line 25, after the word "each," to strike out the words "thirty-seven" and insert "fifty-two;" so as to read:

For ministers resident at Belgium, Netherlands, Sweden and Norway, Turkey, Venezuela, Hawaiian Islands, and the United States of Colombia, at $7,500 each, $52,500.

Mr. WINDOM. To carry out the amendment which I proposed a moment ago, I move to insert in line 23, after the word "Venezuela," the words "Argentine Republic;" in line 25, to strike out "fifty-two," and insert "sixty;" and after the word "thousand" strike out the words "five hundred;" so as to make the clause read:

Mr. WINDOM. As a part of the same amendment made a moment ago, I move to insert after the word "Denmark" the words "Paraguay and Uruguay," and in line 40 to strike out the word "fifteen" and insert the word "twenty;" so as to make it read:

For salary of chargés d'affaires to Portugal, Denmark, Paraguay and Uruguay, and Switzerland, at $5,000 each, $20,000.

Mr. PADDOCK. I wish to call the attention of the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations to the consulate at Chemnitz, Saxony, Germany. The exports from that port are very much larger than they are from very many of the ports where there are consuls in Germany, except one, and it is placed in the fifth class. It is the second most important consulate in Germany. I should like to inquire upon what theory these amendments are made, whether it is to conform to the law as it now stands regulating salaries, or whether it would be possible, in accordance with that theory, to make such a change in reference to Chemnitz as is due to its importance.

Mr. WINDOM. The theory upon which we have changed the classification of the bill as it came from the House was to conform to the existing law, and Chemnitz is, as I believe it is by law, placed in the fifth class. We could not, without violating the principle upon which all the amendments to the bill are made, change this to any other class, although the facts may be as stated by my friend from Nebraska.

Mr. PADDOCK. To illustrate: I should like to call the attention of the chairman of the committee to the fact that last year the exports from Chemnitz were $14,658,576, and from Dresden, which is in the fourth class, a class ahead of Chemnitz, the exports were only $2,746,115; and the same disparity exists throughout.

Mr. WINDOM. I have no doubt that such cases frequently exist in the bill, but the Committee on Appropriations do not feel it to be their duty or their privilege even to revise these consulates and fix the compensation all over the country, but simply conform to the law.

Mr. PADDOCK. There ought certainly at some time, somewhere, to be a revision to correct such inequalities and disparities. This consulate certainly ought to be in the second class instead of the fifth. The Chief Clerk resumed the reading of the bill.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was in schedule C, line 223, under the head of "Great Britain," after "Gaspé Basin" to insert "Southampton; Turk's Islands;" so as to read:

Great Britain.—Ceylon; Gaspé Basin; Southampton; Turk's Islands; Windsor, (Nova Scotia.)

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was after line 224 to insert:

Germany.—Stettin.

French Dominions.—Nantes.

Spanish Dominions.—Valencia.

Danish Dominions.—Santa Cruz.

Italy.—Milan; Venice.

China.—Swatow.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line 246, after "Para," to insert "Maranham;" so as to read:

Brazil.—Para; Maranham; Rio Grande del Sul.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line 248, after "Truxillo," to strike out "to reside at Utila;" so as to read:

Honduras.—Ruatan and Truxillo.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was under the head of "commercial agencies," schedule B, in line 275, after "Manchester," to insert "Beirut."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line 277, after "Leith," to insert "Naples."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line 299, to increase the appropriation "for consular officers not citizens of the United States" from $3,000 to $5,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line 302, to increase the appropriation "for salaries of the marshals for the consular courts in Japan and China, Siam, and Turkey, including loss by exchange," from $7,000 to $7,500.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to strike out the following words, from line 313 to line 328:

And it shall be the duty of consuls to make to the Secretary of State a quarterly statement of exports from, and imports to, the different places to which they are accredited, giving, as near as may be, the market price of the various articles of exports and imports, the duty and port charges, if any, on articles imported and exported, together with such general information as they may be able to obtain as to how, where, and through what channels a market may be opened for American products and manufactures. In addition to the duties now imposed by law, it shall be the duty of consuls and commercial agents of the United States, annually, to procure and transmit to the Department of State, as far as practicable, information respecting the rate of wages paid for skilled and unskilled labor within their respective jurisdictions.

Mr. SARGENT. I move to perfect the section before the question is taken on striking out by amending the clause so as to read:

Every consular officer shall furnish to the Secretary of the Treasury, or to such officers of the customs as he may direct, as often as may be required, the prices-current of all articles of merchandise usually exported to the United States from the port or place in which he is stationed; and authority is hereby vested in the Secretary of the Treasury to require a compliance with this provision.

The reason why the Committee on Appropriations struck out the provision as contained in the House bill is because it is believed that section 1712 of the Revised Statutes contains power on the part of the Secretary of State to require information upon this and all other matters. That section reads:

Consuls and commercial agents of the United States in foreign countries shall procure and transmit to the Department of State authentic commercial information respecting such countries, of such character, and in such manner and form, and at such times as the Department may from time to time prescribe.

It will be observed that in a very condensed and direct form the Revised Statutes now give the power and enjoin the obedience of the consuls for all such information. Unfortunately, however, there is no means by which consular agents can be required to transmit necessary information to the Treasury Department. Consuls are in one sense the mere agents of the Treasury Department; their chief function is to guard the Treasury, and unless they can communicate directly to the Treasury Department such information as may be required, and do it speedily and at frequent intervals, it is of no value. After the information gets old it is of no value at all to the appraisers. It would be well if the consular system were put under the charge of the Treasury Department. That, however, would be too radical a change to discuss upon this bill, and I would not propose anything of the kind. I have here in my hand, and I think I can read in the five minutes allotted to me, a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury and one upon which that is based coming from his Department. He says:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, March 12, 1878.

SIR: I beg leave to call your attention to a letter from the supervising special agent of this Department of the date of March 11, a copy of which is inclosed.

I approve the recommendation in this letter, and in compliance therewith have written to the Secretary of State such a communication as is suggested, but it seems to me that it would be proper to embody this recommendation as a provision of the consular and diplomatic bill for the next fiscal year. The importance of prompt, accurate, and direct information from consuls to the appraisers of the leading ports is so manifest that I think it would be better to require it, by express provision of law, from our consuls.

In pursuance of our conversation of to-day, I submit the matter to your judgment.

Very respectfully,

JOHN SHERMAN,
Secretary.

Hon. A. A. SARGENT,
United States Senate.

This is the letter to himself:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
Washington, D. C., March 11, 1878.

SIR: The appraisers of merchandise at New York and at other ports are at all times greatly embarrassed in the discharge of their duties for the want of prompt and reliable information from the foreign markets in which goods appraised by them are originally sold for export to the United States.

Of some classes of staple goods no sales are made in the foreign markets to merchants in this country, but all such goods are consigned by the foreign manufacturers to their agents in the United States for sale, and in such cases, where the goods pay ad valorem duties, it may be said to be a regular practice to invoice them below their true market value abroad.

This system of consignment instead of actual sale is growing year by year, and the revenue is being defrauded of millions by foreign manufacturers, who thus escape payment of full duties, and, at the same time, cripple competing American industries. The appraisers, with their present sources of information, are unable to stem the tide of undervaluation when it has become so general and overwhelming. If an invoice of consigned goods is advanced by the appraiser and a reappraisal is had, the consignees are always able to produce a dozen witnesses to swear that the invoice values are correct. These witnesses are usually persons connected with commission houses engaged in the business of receiving foreign goods on consignment; and as American merchants do not buy the goods abroad, having been driven out of the foreign markets by the system referred to, testimony to prove the true value can seldom be obtained.

To obviate in some measure these difficulties in appraisements, I respectfully recommend that the subject be brought to the attention of the honorable Secretary of State, with the suggestion that the consuls of the United States at the principal commercial centers of Europe be instructed to forward at least twice a month direct to the appraisers at New York, Boston, Philadelphia, Baltimore, New Orleans, San Francisco, Chicago, Cincinnati, and Saint Louis, or to such ports as receive the bulk of the commodities embraced in invoices certified by such consuls, respectively, and also through the Department of State to this Department a statement showing the prices at which actual sales are made to other countries of the leading articles of export to the United States, without regard to values stated in invoices passing through the consulates. If printed prices-current can be obtained they should be forwarded to the appraisers; if not, the information desired should be obtained from the best sources available.

As to staple goods, such as black silks, ribbons, velvets, gloves, woollens, &c., the consul's statement should embrace full information respecting the value of raw materials, the cost of labor, and the whole cost of manufacture.

With full reports of this character before them, received regularly twice a month direct from the foreign markets, the appraisers would be placed upon an equal footing with importers as to knowledge of foreign values, and not be compelled as now to seek and act upon information from persons interested in maintaining undervaluations.

A file of such reports from consuls in this Department would be of great value in the investigation of cases of fraudulent undervaluation and the equalization of appraisements at the several ports.

Very respectfully,

A. K. TINGLE,
Supervising Special Agent.

Hon. JOHN SHERMAN,
Secretary of the Treasury.

To send this information through the State Department requires it to pass through five hands before it can reach the appraisers. It is then too late to do any good. It is like last year's newspapers so far as news is concerned. This amendment is directly in the line of the purpose of the House in this matter, and I trust it will be adopted. It certainly can do no harm to furnish this information to the Treasury Department, especially as the Secretary of the Treasury says the Government loses millions by undervaluation.

Mr. WINDOM. Mr. President—

Mr. SARGENT. I hope the Senator will not oppose this amendment.

Mr. WINDOM. This proposition made by the Senator from California was made in the Committee on Appropriations and almost unanimously voted down.

Mr. SARGENT. That is a very unfair statement of the case.

Mr. WINDOM. In what particular?

Mr. SARGENT. I will allow my friend to get through.

Mr. WINDOM. And it was voted down for the reasons which I will give—

Mr. SARGENT. There was no discussion of this matter in the Committee on Appropriations. A moment or two before it adjourned I asked leave to read these papers to the committee and time did not allow. I did not have the amendment prepared, had not yet received it from the Treasury Department, but reserved the right to move it in the Senate. Now, if the Senator can state that there was any intelligent discussion of it in the Committee on Appropriations or that it is improper legislation, let him say so. I say there was no such expression on the part of the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. WINDOM. I have not the slightest feeling about this matter, and I hope my friend from California will not have any. I did not understand that he was to move it in the Senate. When he says there was no intelligent discussion of it, I will say that the very letter which he has read here to the Senate this afternoon, and upon which he bases his application for his motion, was read in the Committee on Appropriations and considered. The very statute which he read, and which I will again read to the Senate, was read and discussed, and the reason that this proposition was voted down was stated in the committee and is this. Section 1712 provides as follows:

Consuls and commercial agents of the United States in foreign countries shall procure and transmit to the Department of State authentic commercial information respecting such countries, of such character, and in such manner and form, and at such times as the Department may from time to time prescribe.

The Committee on Appropriations struck out the provision in the House bill, for the reason that the section of the statutes just read is broader than the provision of the bill itself. It gives to the Secretary of State full power to require any reports that may be necessary for the public service, and all the Secretary of the Treasury need do is to call upon the Secretary of State to procure such reports as are proposed to be given by the amendment of the Senator from California. Now, if there does not exist that confidence between the Secretary of the Treasury and the Secretary of State that the one may call upon the other for information necessary to save many millions of dollars, then it is time there was some change in one or the other of those Departments.

Mr. SARGENT. The Senator knows very well that the discussion to which he refers, if it took place in committee at all, was while I was going to another committee-room to obtain these papers, and when I returned I had barely time to read these papers and then the committee was just about adjourning, and I said I would move it in the Senate. I have no doubt other Senators can remember it. No good reason has been given why the proposition I propose here shall not go into this bill. I myself showed in the remarks I made that the Revised Statutes give all the power to the Secretary of State that is necessary, but the object is to have this information reach the Treasury Department directly, instead of passing through five hands as it does now. Of course the Secretary of State on the request of the Secretary of the Treasury will get any information that is needed, but it has to be received by the Secretary of State and then sent to the Treasury Department, and then passing through different hands finally reaches the appraisers when it is too late to save undervaluation. As I said before, it is like reading last year's newspapers or last year's prices-current. You cannot compete with this fraudulent undervaluation under these circumstances. The Treasury Department appeals for legislation which will enable it to get this information, and I say again the Committee on Appropriations never passed on the merits of this proposition. The amendment never was before them. I received it myself to-day by telegram from the Secretary of the Treasury; and I had to inquire of my friend from Iowa the section of the statute which was read in my absence while I was out from the committee-room, gone in search of the letter he had written me; and here is the telegram I have received. If any one says that was discussed in the Committee on Appropriations and unanimously voted down, I assert that he says so under an error. I say it was not discussed.

Mr. WINDOM. I do not know that the particular amendment in the words the Senator has suggested here to day was discussed, but the proposition was discussed; the letter of the Secretary of the Treasury was read, but that is not a matter that the Senate cares anything about one way or the other. It is a question what it will decide. Now I think the Committee on Appropriations fully understood it. I certainly understood it from the statement made by the Senator from California in the committee precisely as I understand it to-day. I understood him, and I see other members of the committee assenting to the same thing, to argue it fully, almost as fully as he has done here to-day, and the whole question was as fully understood to my mind and to the minds of other members of the committee as it is now.

I do not find any fault with the Senator from California offering this provision. I think he is unnecessarily nettled at my opposing it. I am simply representing the committee in this matter. It was distinctly voted down in the committee because it was unnecessary and because the Secretary of State, as was said in the committee, had full power now to get this information and all the Secretary of the Treasury had to do was to call on him for it, and it was not necessary to legislate on that subject. I have no choice whether the Senate passes it or not.

Mr. SARGENT. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Senators will bear in mind that the five-minute rule has been applied to this bill.

Mr. INGALLS. I ask for the application of that rule.

Mr. SARGENT. I ask leave of the Senate to say a few words.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from California asks unanimous consent of the Senate to be heard. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. SARGENT. The Senator shows that this proposition was not discussed in the committee by discussing another proposition, and that is as to the powers of the Secretary of State. That was the proposition which was discussed and discussed in my absence. There is no doubt that the Secretary of State has power in this matter; but the point is that his exercise of power does not help the Treasury Department; the information gets there too late. That matter was not discussed. How much time the other point was discussed while I was hunting up these papers and had to leave the committee-room for them, I do not know. I objected that the Senator should attempt to crush out this amendment by stating that the Committee on Appropriations had decided against it, that it had discussed it and decided against it, and therefore it was not to be considered here. I deny that this proposition was ever considered in the Committee on Appropriations either verbally or otherwise, and it stands on its own merits before the Senate.

Mr. ALLISON. I should be glad to arbitrate the question between my two friends.

Mr. WINDOM. My friend from Iowa is always an arbitrator.

Mr. ALLISON. When this point was reached, as the Senator from California will remember, he left the committee-room to find some papers; I believe the very papers read here. In his absence this question was discussed in the committee.

Mr. WINDOM. In that the arbitrator is entirely mistaken, for this section was left and another proceeded with, and it was not touched during the absence of the Senator from California.

Mr. ALLISON. Then I will accept the statement of my friend from Minnesota.

Mr. SARGENT. They were discussing it on my return.

Mr. ALLISON. However, this is immaterial for what I desire to say. I object to the amendment of the Senator from California, but I do not put the objection on the ground that this matter was disposed of in committee. Under section 1712 of the Revised Statutes the Secretary of State has ample power to make full and complete regulations, and in the exercise of that power he has made more complete regulations than are to be found in this section as it stands, coming from the House, or as proposed even by the Senator from California.

I object to the amendment proposed by the Senator from California for another reason, that it makes these consuls subject to the orders and directions of two Departments. First, the Secretary of State has power under the law to make regulations and require reports; and, secondly, under this proposition, the Secretary of the Treasury has the right to direct the consuls. These regulations may conflict; we do not know; and thus the consuls may be required under two Departments of the Government to make reports and make reports separately to each. Even under the proposition of the Senator from California the Secretary of the Treasury may give a list of public appraisers at the several ports of the United States, and the consuls will be required to make reports to these appraisers and they may be changed semi-monthly or monthly, as the case may be. It seems to me that this amendment as proposed by the Treasury Department, as stated by the Senator from California, would only create confusion in reference to this very subject about which we need information. My friend from California suggests that it will save millions to the Treasury.

Mr. SARGENT. The Secretary of the Treasury suggests that.

Mr. ALLISON. It is most remarkable, if we have lost millions by reason of the fact that the Secretary of State has neglected his duty in this regard, that the discovery has not been made before. I do not believe it will make a difference of a farthing to the Treasury except that it will compel these consuls to pay double postage, first to the State Department, second to the Treasury Department, and be subjected to two heads, the Secretary of State and the Secretary of the Treasury. If we are to change the law in this matter, let us place the consuls under the control of the Secretary of the Treasury and let him require the reports to be made to his Department, and not to the Department of the Secretary of State.

Mr. BECK. I agreed with the committee in striking out what the House had put it, believing that the provisions of the Revised Statutes were ample for the purpose; but I want to say now that I shall vote for the amendment of the Senator from California because it is an extremely valuable one. Really, the only way I know of to make the consular service useful is to require it to keep the Treasury Department advised of the very things it now seeks to get informed about. While the Secretary of State ought to so advise his consuls to do whatever the Secretary of the Treasury requires them to do in this respect, he may not always do it, and I can see no harm growing out of the fact that the Secretary of the Treasury may call on an officer of another Department to give him certain specific information bearing upon the duties of the Treasury Department.

Mr. ALLISON. But these consuls are not to report to the Treasury Department, but to the appraisers of the several ports.

Mr. SARGENT. That is a mistake; let the amendment be read again.

Mr. BECK. The amendment of the Senator from California I should like to hear read again.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the amendment of Mr. SARGENT.

Mr. BECK. "The Secretary of the Treasury, or such officer as the Secretary of the Treasury may direct," but it is all to be done under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury. Now we know that much valuable information can be given at very important times in that way. I cannot see what harm can come from it. Although I agree with the committee that the provisions of the Revised Statutes were ample, I think this amendment is proper, and therefore I shall exercise the privilege of voting against the committee and for the amendment of the Senator from California.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from California, to insert certain words in lieu of those proposed to be stricken out by the Committee on Appropriations.

The question being put, there were, on a division—ayes 21, noes 16; no quorum voting.

Mr. WINDOM. I call for the yeas and nays.

Several SENATORS. Let us adjourn.

Mr. WINDOM. I hope there will be no adjournment. This is the last disputed question on the bill, and I would rather permit the amendment to go in than have a quorum broken up. I do not regard it as of any sort of importance, except that it is unnecessary, and therefore ought not to be put in.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to this amendment?

Mr. ALLISON. I object.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The yeas and nays are called for.

Mr. MORRILL and others. Let us have a second count.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. A second count is called for on the amendment of the Senator from California. The Chair will put the question again.

The question being again put, the amendment was agreed to; there being on a division—ayes 27, noes 19.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question recurs on the motion of the Committee on Appropriations, to strike out the clause as amended. The motion was not agreed to.

Mr. ALLISON. Now, I should like to know how the provision stands. Is the proposition of the Senator from California substituted for the language of the House bill?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is the effect of the vote just taken.

The Chief Clerk continued the reading of the bill.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was in line 356, to increase the appropriation "for relief and protection of American seamen in foreign countries" from $50,000 to $60,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to strike out the clause from line 367 to line 372:

And the salaries provided in this act for the officers within named respectively shall be in full for the annual salaries thereof from and after the 1st day of July, 1878; and all laws and parts of laws in conflict with the provisions of this act are hereby repealed.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to strike out lines 378 and 379, in the following words:

For diplomatic and consular service, to be expended in the discretion of the President, $20,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SPENCER. I offer the following amendment. After the word "seventy-eight," in line 330, I move to insert:

Provided, That before any part of the appropriation provided for in this act shall become available the appointments in the consular and diplomatic service shall be so arranged as to be equally distributed between the several States of the United States, Territories, and the District of Columbia, according to population.

Mr. WINDOM. I think that proposition needs no discussion. I move to lay it on the table.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Minnesota moves to lay the amendment on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Will the Senate concur in the amendments made as in Committee of the Whole?

Mr. ANTHONY. I ask to except the last amendment striking out the appropriation of $20,000 for diplomatic and consular service to be expended in the discretion of the President.

Mr. SARGENT. On the suggestion of several Senators, in order to be sure that by the amendment already adopted on my motion the provisions of section 1712 of the Revised Statutes are not impaired, I wish to add this in the Senate to the amendment which I offered.

But this provision shall not have the effect to impair the provisions of section 1712 of the Revised Statutes.

Mr. WINDOM. I have no objection to the adoption of that amendment, and I think with it the bill will be about as good as it was before the Senator from California moved his amendment. It is about the same thing; so I have no objection.

Mr. SARGENT. I think it is infinitely better.

Mr. WINDOM. I think it is about as good.

Mr. SARGENT. I have no doubt I could satisfy the Committee on Appropriations, if I had a hearing.

The amendment of Mr. SARGENT was agreed to.

Mr. ALLISON. On line 313 I move to strike out "fifteen" and insert "twenty;" so as to increase the appropriation for contingent expenses of United States consulates from $115,000 to $120,000.

Mr. EDMUNDS. We have not yet agreed to the amendments made in Committee of the Whole. This is an amendment to the text as it stands.

Mr. ALLISON. I beg pardon.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on concurring in the amendments agreed to in Committee of the Whole, except the one reserved at the suggestion of the Senator from Rhode Island, [Mr. ANTHONY.]

The amendments were concurred in.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question now is on the amendment reserved by the Senator from Rhode Island, [Mr. ANTHONY.]

Mr. ANTHONY. It strikes me that clause should not be stricken out. It places a very moderate sum at the disposal of the Executive for unforeseen diplomatic and consular exigencies. Cases are constantly arising in which diplomatic employment is necessary, and the sum is so small that I think it should remain as the House has put it.

Mr. WINDOM. This appropriation has not been usual in appropriation bills. It was inserted two years ago when a large number of consulates was stricken out, for the purpose of partially providing for the deficiency, as I understood. The Senator from California had charge of the bill at the time, and he knows why it was put in. We have reinstated ten of the principal consulates, and in the opinion of the committee it was not necessary that this general fund should be appropriated. It is certainly the worst possible way to appropriate money; and as we have reinstated the principal consulates, we thought the item had better be stricken out.

Mr. SARGENT. I think we have restored every consulate that would be required to draw upon any such fund.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I am rather inclined to agree with the Senator from Rhode Island. Although we make specific provision for all the consuls named and for the ministers named, yet the amount that is appropriated specifically for that service is for salaries. Now, it must happen in the course of the diplomatic intercourse of the United States and in the consular service that there are exigencies that suddenly arise from time to time where the obtaining of information by some special mission or agent or in some way that the statutes would not wish to state in specific terms, but which is left to the discretion of the Executive always, would be of great use to the United States; and I think we can trust the President of the United States with this small sum of money as a contingent fund, so to speak, for this service.

Mr. ALLISON. This sum of $20,000 was inserted in the House on the motion of Mr. HEWITT, of New York, if I may allude to it, and because the House had struck out the missions to Belgium, the Netherlands, Denmark, Switzerland, and Greece, and I think one or two other small missions, and it was proposed to give a general fund to the Secretary of State, in other words to substitute for those missions struck from the bill in the House a general fund for diplomatic service. Now the Senate has restored every one of those missions specifically, so that the reason originally for this provision has passed away. Hereafter if the House adheres to its position this last sum will be necessary. If it agrees to what the Senate has done, this sum will not be necessary. It was put in for a specific purpose; that is, to take the place of the missions struck out by the House bill. That is all there is of it.

Now if this sum is necessary in addition to all that we have appropriated, so be it; but it is sufficient to say that the Secretary of State has never asked it, and it has never been estimated for. He does not ask for any such appropriation, and it is usual here to object to appropriations that are not estimated for. So it seems to me there is no reason why it ought to be inserted, if we retain the bill as reported by the Committee on Appropriations of the Senate.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It is usual here to object to appropriations that are not estimated for unless the Senate can see a good reason why the appropriation ought to be made. I have no right to know, and I do not know, the motives that influenced the House of Representatives or the discussion which led to the introduction of this particular clause, and I do not wish to refer to them at all because I think it is very improper, not in this particular instance but in general; it leads to difficulties, for if one side refer and another side refer to such matters they finally get to saying things that are disagreeable.

Mr. ALLISON. It is perfectly palpable on the face of this bill that the House did refuse to appropriate for six or seven missions, and we have inserted them all.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is palpable, and that is a perfectly correct and fair argument for what it is worth. My proposition is that having restored or created sundry missions in South America, some that the House has not provided for, there is still in the present condition of the industry and trade of the United States and of the fields where the United States may find markets for its commodities, notwithstanding all these additions, a reason why the President of the United States should have some money at his discretion to employ agents for information and inquiry and everything that an energetic magistrate could do besides what has been done specifically in the way of salaries to see what can be done to promote the interests of the United States with foreign countries. I hope no Senator will be afraid to trust this small sum with the President of the United States.

Mr. WINDOM. For one, I have no fear to trust this sum to the President of the United States, if he wants it; but I do not wish to thrust it upon the President of the United States and the Secretary of State when they have not asked for it and, so far as we know, do not want it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. They will not draw it if it is not wanted.

Mr. WINDOM. As the Senator from California has said, there is no estimate for this sum. The Committee on Appropriations requested the State Department to appear and make such recommendations as they desired before the committee. The representative of the State Department was sent to us, and nothing of the kind was asked for by him. Since this bill has been reported by the committee—

Mr. EATON. Let me say that the representative of the State Department said it was not necessary.

Mr. WINDOM. That is a fact which I had forgotten.

Mr. EATON. After the amendments which we had made to the bill, he said it was entirely unnecessary.

Mr. WINDOM. I now remember that distinctly. It had escaped my memory when I made the remark I did a moment ago. Since the bill was reported by the Committee on Appropriations a copy has been sent to the State Department showing this item to be stricken out. Now, I do not think we are so anxious to appropriate money that we will thrust it on them when they say it is not wanted, say it is not necessary, and after it has been stricken out do not protest against the striking out.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on concurring in the amendment striking out the appropriation in lines 378 and 379.

The amendment was concurred in.

Mr. ALLISON. In line 313 I move to strike out "15" and insert "20," so as to increase the appropriation for contingent expenses of all the consulates from $115,000 to $120,000. I offer this amendment in view of the amendment which has been agreed to in reference to the reports to be made to the Secretary of the Treasury. I do not know that any additional sum will be necessary, but I think in order to make proper inquiry we should gather jurisdiction of that particular clause.

Mr. EDMUNDS. This last clause that the Senate has stricken out with such great unanimity for fear the President, who did not want it, would take the money for his private use, or the Secretary or somebody else, would have covered that very thing. That is one of the things that the money might have been used for.

Mr. ALLISON. Allow me to beg the Senator's pardon. I do not see how it could be so used. This is a specific appropriation for the contingent expenses of consuls.

Mr. ANTHONY. Does that amendment come from the Committee on Appropriations?

Mr. ALLISON. No, sir.

Mr. ANTHONY. Then it is not in order. It increases the appropriation.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is so. That is the end of the amendment.

Mr. ALLISON. I will withdraw it, of course.

Mr. EDMUNDS. You need not withdraw it; it is out of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is the point of order insisted upon?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Certainly.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The point is well taken, in the opinion of the Chair.

Mr. ALLISON. I do not think the Senator from Rhode Island would object to it if he understood my object. We have added largely to the incidental expenses of these consulates, and the proper officer of the State Department stated that the amount allowed by the House was very small. Now, we have imposed upon all these consuls an additional burden, namely to report to the Secretary of the Treasury as well as to report to the State Department. It may be that no further fund for incidental expenses will be required. If not, of course in conference the amendment can be stricken out, but without knowing the precise effect of the amendment of the Senator from California, I think this contingent fund ought to be increased. I only made the motion pro forma, in order that the conference committee might have jurisdiction of the subject. I do not care about it.

Mr. PADDOCK. I should like to inquire if it be in order to move an amendment to transfer one consulate to another?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. An amendment is in order.

Mr. PADDOCK. I wish to offer an amendment to transfer a consulate from one class to another.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It can be transferred from a higher to a lower grade; as that would not increase the appropriations in the bill.

Mr. PADDOCK. No; I want to make a transfer from a lower to a higher class.

Mr. SARGENT. That would be liable to a point of order.

Mr. PADDOCK. That is the question I was asking.

Mr. WINDOM. That would increase the appropriation.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It would be in violation of the rule, in the opinion of the Chair.

Mr. PADDOCK. The increase would not be material. It would be only $500.

Mr. ANTHONY. The Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] can accomplish his object by moving to reconsider the vote by which the appropriation of $20,000 was rejected, and that appropriation will answer the purpose for which he desires the increase to the consular contingent fund.

Mr. ALLISON. That will not answer at all. If that appropriation were made it could not be used for this purpose.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Why not?

Mr. ALLISON. Because this relates to the contingent expenses of officers existing.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is a little odd. Here is the way it reads:

For contingent expenses of United States consulates, such as stationery, book-cases, arms of the United States, seal, presses, and flags, rent, freight, postage, and other necessary miscellaneous matters.

Now, at the end, you add a provision:

For diplomatic and consular service, to be expended in the discretion of the President, $20,000.

I should like to know on what principle of law or justice it is that the President cannot, for other miscellaneous matters, in his discretion make use of some part of the $20,000.

Mr. SARGENT. I do not think there is any necessity for increasing the item for contingent expenses of the consulates because they are required to send a newspaper once or twice a month containing the prices-current. That would be a very slight expense, and as they only have to send them from some of the principal cities in which business is done abroad and to some of the principal cities of America a half dozen each, I do not believe that is an argument for increasing the appropriation for contingent expenses.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Rhode Island move a reconsideration?

Mr. ANTHONY. I voted in the affirmative and I cannot move a reconsideration. I suggested that the Senator from Iowa might move a reconsideration.

Mr. ALLISON. If it accomplished the purpose, I should be glad to do so.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

NAVIGATION OF MISSISSIPPI RIVER.

Mr. WINDOM submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (S. No. 863) to provide for the organization of the Mississippi River improvement commission, and for the correction, permanent location, and deepening of the channel and the improvement of the navigation of said Mississippi River; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

FUNERAL OF HON. J. E. LEONARD.

Mr. CONOVER. I desire to offer a resolution, and ask for its present consideration.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I call for the regular order, to get at the unfinished business.

Mr. CONOVER. I think the resolution will not be objected to if it is heard.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I merely want to get the regular order under consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The regular order is Senate bill No.

15, which will be considered, the unfinished business having been laid aside informally.

Mr. CONOVER. I now offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate is hereby directed to pay out of the contingent fund of the Senate the necessary expenses of the committee of the Senate appointed to attend the funeral of the late Hon. John E. Leonard, on vouchers to be approved by the chairman of the committee.

The resolution was considered, by unanimous consent, and agreed to.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at five o'clock and twenty-five minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, March 27, 1878.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. P. HARRISON.

The Journal of yesterday was read.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

Mr. PRICE. I understood from the reading of the Journal that the request I made last evening for the withdrawal of certain papers from the files of the House was referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

The SPEAKER. Certainly.

Mr. PRICE. That was not my understanding at the time.

The SPEAKER. There being an adverse report on the case, the request for the withdrawal of the papers, under the rule, had to go to the committee for consideration. The rule will be read.

Mr. PRICE. I am satisfied with the statement of the Chair. I do not desire to hear the rule read.

The Journal was then approved.

PENSIONS.

Mr. JOYCE, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4110) for the relief of persons entitled to pensions; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. JOYCE. I ask that the bill may be read at length.

The bill was read at length, and referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

SALE OF TIMBER ON MENOMONEE RESERVATION.

Mr. STEWART, (by request,) by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4111) to provide for the sale of certain timber on the Menomonee Indian reservation in Wisconsin, and to pay certain claims against said tribes out of the proceeds thereof; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

COMPENSATION TO NORTH CAROLINA.

Mr. DAVIS, of North Carolina, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4112) to compensate the State of North Carolina for the use and occupation of certain grounds and buildings by United States troops; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of Claims, and ordered to be printed.

PRINTING OF MAP.

Mr. EICKHOFF, from the Committee on Printing, reported back, with a favorable recommendation, the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on Foreign Affairs be authorized to have a map printed to accompany their report on the Mexican troubles.

The resolution was adopted.

Mr. EICKHOFF moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MARGARET KEARNS.

Mr. BLISS, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4113) granting a pension to Margaret Kearns; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

HANNA STREETS.

On motion of Mr. CARLISLE, by unanimous consent, the bill (S. No. 873) granting a pension to Hanna Streets was taken from the Speaker's table, read a first and second time, ordered to be printed, and referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, not to be brought back on a motion to reconsider.

CENTENNIAL INTERNATIONAL EXHIBITION.

Mr. PEDDIE, by unanimous consent, presented a joint resolution of the Legislature of the State of New Jersey, in reference to closing up the centennial international exhibition, to ascertain the balance due to subscribers, and to prepare and support an act appropriating the sum from the Treasury of the United States; which was referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

LIEUTENANT GARDNER P. THORNTON.

Mr. BROWNE, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4114) for the relief of Lieutenant Gardner P. Thornton, late of the Fourteenth Regiment of Colored Troops; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on War Claims, and ordered to be printed.

AUGUST MARMER.

Mr. BROWNE also, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4115) granting a pension to August Marmer, late a private in Company B, Forty-ninth Regiment of Indiana Volunteers; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

BATTLE OF GETTYSBURGH.

Mr. BLAIR, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs be requested to ascertain and report to the House the proper measures to be taken for the preservation and publication of the materials for the description and detailed history and maps of the battle of Gettysburgh, prepared by Colonel John B. Batchelder and now in his possession, and recommend such action to the House as in their judgment may be necessary in the premises.

PROPERTY OF SOLDIERS' HOME AT HARRODSBURGH, KENTUCKY.

Mr. DURHAM. I ask unanimous consent to introduce at this time and have put upon its passage a bill authorizing the sale of the property belonging to the Soldiers' Home at Harrodsburgh, Kentucky, in my district. I present with the bill the recommendations of the Secretary of War and of the board of commissioners for the sale of the property immediately, so that the proceeds may be invested in other property.

Mr. SAMPSON. From what committee does the bill come?

Mr. DURHAM. It does not come from any committee. I ask unanimous consent that it may be put upon its passage at this time.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read for information; after which the Chair will ask for objections, if any.

The bill was read.

Mr. DURHAM. I ask that the letters of the Secretary of War and of the board of commissioners recommending this sale be read.

Mr. SAMPSON. Why not send the bill to a committee?

Mr. DURHAM. It is desirable that the sale be made immediately, and that the delay which would result from sending the bill to a committee should be avoided. But of course, if objection is made, the bill will have to go over. I present it because of the recommendation of the Secretary of War and the board of commissioners, the property being in my own district.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. Let us hear what they say about it.

The Clerk read the letters from the Secretary of War and from the board of commissioners of the Soldiers' Home recommending the sale.

Mr. CONGER. Before being asked to consider this bill I think we should have some more information. I wish to say, Mr. Speaker—

The SPEAKER. The gentleman cannot enter upon a discussion of the bill until the consent of the House is given to its present consideration.

Mr. CONGER. I do not propose to enter upon a discussion of the bill, but I propose to state in a word why I object.

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman objects, that is all that is necessary.

Mr. DURHAM. If the gentleman from Michigan objects, I withdraw the bill and throw the responsibility on him.

Mr. CONGER. The gentleman may throw that responsibility upon me as much as he chooses.

Mr. DURHAM. All right.

The SPEAKER. Objection being made to the present consideration of the bill, does the gentleman from Kentucky ask to have it referred?

Mr. DURHAM. Yes, sir; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

There being no objection, the bill (H. R. No. 4116) authorizing the board of commissioners of the Soldiers' Home to sell certain property at Harrodsburgh, Kentucky, belonging to the Soldiers' Home, was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

DECORUM IN THE HALL.

Mr. DUNNELL. I ask that Rule 65 be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

65. While the Speaker is putting any question or addressing the House, none shall walk out of or across the House; nor in such case, or when a member is speaking, shall entertain private discourse; nor while a member is speaking, shall pass between him and the Chair. Every member shall remain uncovered during the session of the House. No member or other person shall visit or remain by the Clerk's table while the yeas and noes are calling, or ballots are counting. Smoking is prohibited within the bar of the House or gallery.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Minnesota has requested the Chair to have that rule read, particularly as to smoking. The Chair notices with regret that members will constantly come into the Hall with lighted cigars in their mouths, emitting smoke all over the Hall. Unless this practice on the part of members is stopped the Chair will have to take the liberty of sending pages to them and notify them in person that they break the rule.

INFECTIOUS DISEASES.

Mr. HARTRIDGE. I call for the regular order of business.

The SPEAKER. The regular order of business is the consideration of the bill which the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. FELTON] has been instructed to report from the Committee on Commerce and which, by unanimous consent, has been set for consideration at this time.

Mr. FELTON. Under the authority heretofore granted, I report back, with an amendment from the Committee on Commerce, the bill (H. R. No. 3739) to prevent the introduction of contagious or infectious diseases into the United States.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That no vessel or vehicle coming from any foreign port or country where any contagious or infectious disease may exist, and no vessel or vehicle conveying any person or persons, merchandise or animals, affected with any infectious or contagious disease, shall enter any port of the United States or pass the boundary line between the United States and any foreign country, except in the manner and subject to the regulations to be prescribed as hereinafter provided.

SEC. 2. That whenever any infectious or contagious disease shall appear in any foreign port or country, and whenever any vessel shall leave any infected foreign port, or, having on board goods or passengers coming from any place or district infected with cholera or yellow fever, shall leave any foreign port, bound for any port in the United States, the consular officer or other representative of the United States at or nearest such foreign port shall immediately inform the supervising surgeon-general of the marine-hospital service thereof, and shall report to him the name, the date of departure, and the port of destination of such vessel; and the consular officers of the United States shall make weekly reports to him of the sanitary condition of the ports at which they are respectively stationed; and the said surgeon-general of the marine-hospital service shall, under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury, be charged with the execution of the provisions of this act, and shall frame all needful rules and regulations for that purpose, which rules and regulations, with the approval of the President, shall have the force and effect of law until modified in the same manner.

SEC. 3. That it shall be the duty of the medical officers of the marine-hospital service and of customs officers to aid in the enforcement of the national quarantine rules and regulations established under the preceding section; but no additional compensation shall be allowed said officers by reason of such services as they may be required to perform under this act, except actual and necessary traveling expenses.

SEC. 4. That the surgeon-general of the marine-hospital service shall, upon receipt of information of the departure of any vessel, goods, or passengers from infected places to any port in the United States, immediately notify the proper officer or officers at the threatened port of destination of the vessel, and shall prepare and transmit to the medical officers of the marine-hospital service, to collectors of customs, and to the State and municipal health authorities in the United States, weekly abstracts of the consular sanitary reports and other pertinent information received by him.

SEC. 5. That the provisions of this act shall not be so construed as to prevent the establishment and maintenance by States or municipalities of port health regulations and quarantine measures, in addition to or furtherance of the rules and regulations established under this act; and such local systems and their appendages shall remain under the control of the respective local authorities; but any local law or regulation interfering with or obstructing the due execution of the national rules and regulations, as approved by the President under this act, shall be null and void.

SEC. 6. That wherever, at any port of the United States, any State or municipal quarantine system may now exist, the officers or agents of such system shall, upon the application of the respective State or municipal authorities, be authorized and empowered to act as officers or agents of the national quarantine system, and shall be clothed with all the powers of United States officers for quarantine purposes, but shall receive no pay or emolument from the United States. At all other ports where, in the opinion of the Secretary of the Treasury, it shall be deemed necessary to establish quarantine, the medical officers or other agents of the marine-hospital service shall perform such duties in the enforcement of the quarantine rules and regulations as may be assigned them by the surgeon-general of that service under this act.

SEC. 7. That this act may be quoted as the national quarantine act of 1878.

SEC. 8. That all acts or parts of acts inconsistent with this act be, and the same are hereby, repealed.

The SPEAKER. Will the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. FELTON] indicate whether he desires to yield to any one for amendments?

Mr. FELTON. I do. I move now, by instructions from the Committee on Commerce, to strike out the fifth section of the bill, and I also yield to my colleague [Mr. HARTRIDGE] to offer amendments.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks it is desirable that the amendments designed to be offered be presented at this time.

Mr. HARTRIDGE. I propose to offer three amendments, which I send to the Clerk's desk to be read.

Mr. HALE. As the time is limited for the consideration of this bill, which is an important one, I suggest that it would be better, after such time has been consumed in debate as may be desired, that the bill be read by sections for amendment and then any member can offer such amendments as he desires.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the suggestion of the gentleman from Maine [Mr. HALE] a very wise one.

Mr. HARTRIDGE. I think so too.

Mr. HALE. I ask, then, that that course be adopted.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will pursue that course when whatever debate that is desired shall have been concluded, but the amendments will now be read.

The Clerk read the amendments of Mr. HARTRIDGE, as follows:

In line 9, after the word "country," insert the words "contrary to the quarantine laws of any one of the United States, or."

In section 4, after the word "proper" in line 4, insert the words, "State or municipal and United States."

In section 2, in line 20, add after the word "manner" the words "but such rules and regulations shall not conflict with or impair any sanitary or quarantine regulation by State or municipal authority."

Mr. O'NEILL. I desire to submit an amendment which I think will be accepted by the gentleman who has the bill in charge.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman having the bill in charge has no right to accept any amendment; but it may be read for information.

Mr. O'NEILL. I ask that it be read.

The Clerk read the amendment, as follows:

After the word "vessel" in the eleventh line of section 2, insert the words "and shall also make the same report to the health-officer of the port of destination in the United States."

The SPEAKER. These several amendments are now being read for information, and while the discussion and consideration of the bill is going on any gentlemen who are interested in this question will have an opportunity of examining them.

Mr. O'NEILL. I have another amendment, to come in at the end of section 5, and I will send the same to the Clerk's desk to be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Provided, That there shall be no interference, in any manner, with any quarantine laws or regulations as they may exist or may hereafter be adopted under State laws.

Mr. COX, of New York. I shall move, at the proper time, to strike out the second section of the bill.

Mr. FELTON. Mr. Speaker, by authority of the committee I move to strike out the fifth section of the bill. I do this that the rights of the States may not even apparently suffer encroachment.

Upon all questions relating to the public health within their territorial limits the States are absolutely sovereign. We must guard most carefully upon all occasions these sacred and very precious rights of the States. We could not permit these rights impaired even if their infringement should temporarily produce valuable results, because these reserved rights of the States are the safeguards of life and property, and above all they secure the liberty of the citizen against the centralizing tendencies of the age. In the outset, then, I hope this section will be stricken from the bill that nothing may remain therein seemingly in conflict with the right of a State to control its own health regulations. The Committee on Commerce has considered the bill, seeking to establish a general and uniform system of quarantine by the Federal Government, the direct object being to prevent the introduction into the United States of contagious or infectious diseases, and after a thorough investigation they report unanimously in favor of its passage.

We have had before us the memorial of a convention composed of delegates from the municipalities of Norfolk, Charleston, Port Royal, Savannah, Darien, Brunswick, Saint Mary's, Fernandina, Jacksonville, Saint Augustine, Cedar Keys, and Pensacola, the proceedings of which convention are indorsed by James A. Stewart, commissioner of health for the city of Baltimore. This convention assembled in Jacksonville, Florida, on the 14th day of February, 1878, for the special purpose of considering the establishment of a uniform and effective system of quarantine on the Atlantic and Gulf coast, as the only reliable means of protection against the importation of contagious and infectious diseases from foreign countries.

It is seen from the proceedings that the convention with remarkable unanimity united in a petition to Congress for the establishment of such a system.

Other cities are equally interested in this matter with those represented in this convention, and we have a letter from Dr. Samuel Choppin, president of the board of health, State of Louisiana, in which he says:

I am favorably impressed with the idea of asking Congress to take some action to the end of bringing about a uniform system of quarantine along the whole seaboard for the protection of our inhabitants against the importation of infectious diseases. The experience of our board of health since 1855 has convinced most of the medical men and other citizens of Louisiana that our comparative immunity from yellow fever for the last ten years has been due chiefly to a strict and intelligent enforcement of our quarantine system, in which latterly thorough disinfection is so much relied upon that detention of vessels and crews is, in most instances, reduced to a few hours.

We have also a resolution passed by the Board of Trade of Mobile, Alabama, October 9, 1873, in these words:

Resolved, Inasmuch as no quarantine measures of our sea-ports can be effective against the importation of diseases without uniformity in time and method, that Congress be memorialized to establish a uniform system of quarantine under national supervision.

Indeed, all the southern cities express a desire for more effective quarantine laws and regulations and will cordially co-operate with the governmental authorities in devising and perfecting some system that will shield our exposed coast cities and inland towns "from the pestilence that walketh in darkness and the destruction that wasteth at noonday."

There are two diseases against which the provisions of this bill are designed particularly to guard our people, and the ravages of which two diseases in the United States have been appalling. These diseases are Asiatic or Indian cholera and yellow fever.

Cholera is caused by the access of a specific organic poison to the alimentary canal, which poison is developed spontaneously only in certain parts of India.

Science has located the very birthplace of this disease, and has demonstrated that it never appears spontaneously outside of these well-defined boundaries. It is indigenous only in the territorial region mentioned, and we are absolutely certain that whenever it appears outside these specified limits it is an exotic.

We can safely assert that no case of malignant cholera has ever occurred in any portion of the globe which was not produced by contact with a pre-existing cholera virus generated originally in Hindostan.

If we could trace accurately this terrible scourge we would see a chain composed of infectious links extending from every case which occurred in this country in the years 1832, 1849, 1854, and 1873, to its natural and endemic home, India.

This well-established fact encourages the hope that an efficient and uniform system of quarantine may in time shut out this disease from our country. It must cross oceans before it can find a lodgment on our shores. It must be conveyed on ships, the particles of a specific poison actively at work or concealed in the clothing, bedding, or other personal luggage of migrants must be entered at some of our ports.

The ocean is the great highway, not only of commerce but of this and other destructive diseases. The General Government can and does regulate this commerce, and surely with the assistance of science it can in some measure control this terrible concomitant of our foreign commercial intercourse. The leading positions here assumed in regard to Asiatic cholera are equally applicable to yellow fever.

It may be endemic in some places on our coast, but nine-tenths of the medical profession in this country believe that it is always imported.

Indeed since 1668, when the disease made its appearance in this country, down to 1877, when a few cases developed themselves in Florida, embracing seven hundred and forty-one appearances of the disease that has spread to two hundred and twenty-eight cities and towns, that has extended to twenty-eight States in the Union, and that has caused 65,311 deaths counted—besides the innumerable deaths of which no record is made—of all these appearances of this disease, about 45 per cent. are clearly traceable to foreign origin.

Many of the remaining epidemics have a very probable connection with foreign ports in which the disease was at the time prevalent and with which the afflicted cities on our coast were at the time in frequent commercial intercourse.

The other epidemics while they may seem to be endemic, springing into existence without any explained cause or attributed, as was usual in former days, to local causes, such as decaying vegetable and animal matter, general filthiness of the city, long-continued disregard of hygienic laws, a temperature ranging above eighty degrees, a low altitude, a humid atmosphere, and frequent and decided meteorological disturbances, yet we must remember that the germs of this contagion are so occult, and have so successfully escaped the most delicate detectives of science, that they may in these last-mentioned epidemics have been lying dormant in some well-concealed nidus and only awaiting favorable climatic and local surroundings for their development.

They may have thus remained, concealed and dormant, during an entire winter—hid away in some uncleaned hospital, some fomites—in the hull or bilge of some infected ship and only waiting for a few heavy blows from the carpenter's hammer or the ripping off of some defaced boards (as was the case with the ship Ben Franklin at Norfolk) and favorable exciting causes, to kindle a pestilence that shall sweep a city or an entire sea-coast.

We can safely assert of yellow fever, as we have stated of cholera, that it comes from without, and that there is no place in the United States where it has yet been naturalized. It is true that no great distance separates its home from our shores—the West Indies, the Bahamas, the South American coast, and possibly Vera Cruz in Mexico. These are its birthplaces, and from these neighboring lands it almost every summer invades our seaboard cities, and occasionally produces a desolation indescribable. Business is suspended; wharves are deserted; harbors never receive a vessel; men, women, and children become refugees; the homes of the rich and poor are alike draped in the habiliments of grief, "because man goeth to his long home and the mourners go about the streets."

Sometimes after nearly all the citizens have abandoned the plague-stricken city the number of deaths and the amount of personal suffering are appalling.

A writer describing the scenes that occurred at Norfolk, Virginia, during the ravages of yellow fever in that city in the year 1855, says, "that the number of deaths reported were about eighty per day," but to his own knowledge they largely exceeded that number. He often saw a large number of coffins lying in different parts of the cemetery awaiting interment. It was common to see in the potter's field piles of coffins and rough boxes, such as they were compelled to substitute for coffins, piled up like cord-wood as high as a man could conveniently reach to pile them, while close by men were digging a pit to cover them out of sight. Sometimes four were put in a box, and he was told that numbers were carried out to the pit wrapped in the blankets on which they died, then placed in layers in the pit to await the resurrection morn. It was stern necessity that compelled the people thus to bury their dead; thus only could they keep the tainted air from being so deeply infected that none could survive the plague. It was the harvest season of the Great Reaper and the living did toil and sweat in binding and carrying home the sheaves after his sickle.

These scenes have been equaled or surpassed in New Orleans, in Savannah, in Charleston, and other Atlantic and Gulf cities.

My friend from New York [Mr. Cox] is nobly engaged in an effort to improve the life-saving service, and the Committee on Commerce will aid him in these humane purposes. But what is that service, if perfected, compared with this quarantine as a life-saving instrumentality? Here and there a few may be rescued from such ill-fated vessels as the Huron and Metropolis, but this national quarantine intelligently proposes to rescue entire cities and even States from the two fell destroyers of our race.

The commercial losses from these invasions of yellow fever have been incalculable.

The memorial accompanying this bill from the convention at Jacksonville asserts that the losses produced by the epidemic which raged in the city of Savannah in 1876 have been estimated at $5,800,000, or nearly one-half the present value of the whole taxable real estate of that city. Occurring in this city during the cotton season, and it being as a cotton market the third in importance in the United States, who can estimate accurately all the money losses to the city, to the State, and to the General Government? Now, multiply this particular loss by the many similar losses almost annually occurring in our cotton ports for the last century, and we may approximate the startling result. All this occasioned by a disease of foreign birth, by an importation, brought hither by ships under the control of the Federal Government and which cannot be controlled by State or municipal authority. Yet the Federal Government has never exercised its constitutional right, has never made an effort to suppress this destroyer of life and property.

Congress has the authority to regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the several States. This imported disease is part and parcel of our commercial intercourse with foreign nations. Why, then, this apathy on the part of the Federal Government? When the southern cities most deeply interested in this matter are here memorializing Congress for the establishment of a uniform system of quarantine why should any Representative hesitate? None need apprehend a conflict between the national quarantine system and the State or municipal quarantine regulations. The State law of quarantine remains supreme within the jurisdiction of the State, and under the provisions of this bill the State quarantine officials may upon their request be made officials of the national quarantine system, the health officers of the city becoming officials under this act. Why delay to make the experiment in bringing about co-operation between the State and General Government in this matter, an experiment which promises such triumphant success?

If there was an armed foe annually threatening our coast and sometimes devastating with fire and sword our most beautiful cities, there are a million of men who in a day would spring to arms, and Congress would vote millions of dollars for their defense. Why, then, fail to defend as far as practicable from this foe, more terrible than "an army with banners?" We hear it said: "Oh, leave it to the States—leave all matters relating to the public health to the cities." We answer, that with three exceptions, namely, New York, Charleston, and New Orleans, the quarantine regulations of our seaboard cities are inefficient and worthless. They have proven themselves in times of danger utterly helpless. They are frequently without organization, without information, without that preparation which is so essential to an efficient quarantine. But it is not proposed to exercise any direction over local health boards. We propose to strike out the fifth section of the bill, so that there may be no seeming conflict between the State and national systems of quarantine, for, I repeat, the State law is supreme on all questions of public health.

The object of the bill is the exclusion from the United States of contagious or infectious diseases—any vessel, goods, or passengers after entering port or already within the United States may be, and will be, subject to the local health boards, if any exist. The sanitary measures contemplated by the bill apply to vessels arriving from without before the vessel, passengers, or merchandise can in any way become subject to State or municipal health rules or regulations. Our friends from California are here seeking to arrest the importation into this country of Chinese immigrants. But pray, if the treaty with China authorizing such immigration were annulled, would the General Government have power to regulate such an appendage of our foreign commerce and at the same time have no power to shut out diseases which our commerce brings into this country?

I notice one of the Senators from Kentucky the other day presented to the Senate a petition from the cattle-breeders of that State, asking the Government to protect their interests against the importation into this country from foreign ports of diseased cattle. It is right; for what power has Kentucky to protect its interests in this particular at the port of New York? But pray, shall we establish a national quarantine against rinderpest, which we have a right to do, and at the same time be powerless to interfere in preventing the introduction of cholera and yellow fever?

The memorial of the quarantine convention held at Jacksonville calls attention to the great losses to commerce from vexatious and unnecessary detentions of vessels in quarantine, detentions which could be relieved by appliances for disinfection which attach to properly equipped quarantine establishments, and which are now entirely wanting in a great majority of the sea-ports and which they are unable to procure.

But the loss to commerce is the least of the evils attending delays of infected ships, as the poison is surely propagated and its virulence increased by such detention. One object of a national quarantine system is to correct, as far as practical, this pernicious practice.

It should be borne in mind that the rules and regulations to be prepared under the provisions of this bill, should it become a law, do not apply to nor can they interfere with health rules for municipalities or States.

Quarantine, so far as the General Government is concerned, can only apply to commerce—to ships—and in this sense comes clearly within the provision of the Constitution, the adoption of which was largely influenced by the motive to regulate commerce, to place under the protection of uniform laws those vital agencies of commerce, "ship-building," the carrying trade, and the protection of seamen.

Speaking of vexatious delays and the loss therefrom, both to life and commerce, we are impressed with the value of this national system of quarantine in relieving the country, by its influence and co-operation, of the present disjointed, inefficient, and often cruel and barbarous systems now in existence. In olden times forty days (quarantina) constituted the period of separation. Sometimes the sick and exposed were driven from the habitations of men, and attending physicians were murdered to prevent them from communicating leprosy, plague, and other contagions to communities. Even now in some ports merchandise is detained, in some cases destroyed, passengers and sailors confined for weeks to certain localities, guarded as rigidly as if they were felons.

What has science, in the management of quarantine, accomplished in this direction? Let us take the quarantine at New York City, as described by Dr. Vanderpoel. In summer, when a ship arrives with yellow fever on board and from a port in which yellow fever prevails, the vessel discharges her cargo in lighters in the stream before going to dock, and is cleansed carefully, and her bilges washed, besides being thoroughly disinfected and ventilated, and by their hospitals and arrangements on Hoffman Island and Dix Island, and by placing those who have been exposed under circumstances favorable for the suppression of the disease, and those attacked being treated for it in a place suitable for cure, there results the least detention and fatality possible under the circumstances.

All the advances made in the New York quarantine have had for their motive the reduction of the detention and annoyance of delay in cases of disease, while at the same time commerce should be as little embarrassed as possible. The health officer of the port is sustained in all his official acts by the commercial interests of New York which find in his pass a protection from the dangers to trade which would follow a commerce in which there was no sanitary restriction. Thus the apparently incongruous interests, quarantine and commerce, are united at this port upon a system which is satisfactory to and adequate for both.

New Orleans is about equal in this respect to New York, and by fumigation, carbolic acid, and other disinfectants, ships, merchandise, and passengers are detained but a few days at quarantine.

The commercial interests of this country demand that the same intelligent and efficient system be extended to every port in the United States, modified of course according to local necessities and requirements and the wishes of State and municipal authorities.

The experience of the medical profession and the sound deductions of science authorize the following conclusions, and which are so well established that they may be regarded as professional axioms, namely:

Asiatic cholera and yellow fever may be excluded from the United States—

First. By a thorough system of sanitation.

Second. By an efficient and uniform system of quarantine.

Both are essential, and a neglect of one may defeat the good results of the other. The first is entirely under the control and direction of State and municipal government, being one of our domestic concerns, over which the Federal authorities must not intermeddle. But it is believed when the local health boards voluntarily become officials of the national system and when the interest and energy and intelligent purposes of the local authorities are awakened by a uniform organization, that increased attention and more liberal expenditures of money and labor will be devoted to local sanitation.

The second means of exclusion, "quarantine" at the entrance of our ports, on the line between States and the high seas, in connection with ships, as a part of our commerce, can certainly be greatly strengthened and perfected by the co-operation of the General Government with the local State officials, and this quarantine in my judgment can never be effective until the Federal Government does co-operate intelligently and decidedly.

This is true for the reason that the information which is essential to a safe and perfectly reliable quarantine can only be obtained through the consular and other commercial agents of the United States at the foreign ports with which we trade.

Here I will read from the report of Dr. Woodworth, supervising surgeon of the marine hospital service, made on the cholera epidemic of 1873. Dr. Woodworth says:

What is needed is that the National Government, through its consular officers, at least at each port of departure, shall acquire the necessary information, and then promptly and intelligently furnish it to the ports and localities exposed. This is entirely aside from a national quarantine board, a national bureau of health, or other specific organization, concerning the present wisdom and expediency of which opinion is at least not unanimous. It is a simple utilization of already existing machinery on the part of the General Government, for the acquisition of knowledge indispensable to the general welfare. Such knowledge cannot through its own agents be acquired by a State or by a municipality; and yet upon such knowledge are the city and the State alone qualified or competent to take action; and upon such knowledge and action does the future immunity from cholera of the country at large depend. A circular-letter from His Excellency the President, through the Department of State, instructing consular officers to place themselves in communication with health authorities of their respective localities; to advise promptly, by cable if necessary, of the outbreak of cholera (or other epidemic disease) at their ports or in any section in communication therewith; and to inspect all vessels clearing for United States ports with reference to the original and intermediate as well as to the final points of departure of emigrants thereon; and to report, always by cable, the sailing and destination of any such vessel carrying infected or suspected passengers or goods; this should be the first step. And the next would be equally simple: a medical officer, selected for his good judgment and attainments in sanitary science, should collate and digest the information thus obtained, and transmit direct to the threatened ports, as well as through the public press, the note of warning. Thus advised, the threatened community would have ample time for preparation, and the publicity given to the warning would be the most efficient means of insuring proper precautionary measures. International sanitary action is too remote, and the steps toward it have been too vacillating in the past to admit of much hope from it for the near future. But the acquisition and diffusion of general sanitary knowledge is a matter in which each nation for itself may engage, and when such knowledge becomes sufficiently widespread all else may be safely left to local and individual effort. Let the General Government do its share in collecting and publishing the information—a work which it alone can do—and the various and varying details of inspection, disinfection, isolation, &c., will be most efficiently, economically, and satisfactorily performed by those most directly and vitally interested—the people themselves.

As it is the custom of emigrants bound for America from the continent of Europe to embark at healthy ports when cholera prevails on the continent, this country is exposed to the introduction of this disease through the personal effects of such emigrants, sailing on healthy vessels from healthy ports. In 1873 three distinct outbreaks of the disease occurred at widely remote points of the United States from poison packed and transported in the effects of emigrants from Holland, Sweden, and Russia. These people and the vessels in which they were carried had been perfectly healthy and the people remained so until their goods were unpacked at Carthage, Ohio; at Crow River, Minnesota; and at Yankton, Dakota, respectively. Within twenty-four hours after the poison particles were liberated the first cases of the disease appeared, and the unfortunates were almost literally swept from the face of the earth.

If the health officer at New York, for instance, had been aware of the facts which were subsequently ascertained concerning the emigrants from Holland, Sweden, and Russia, there is no reason to doubt that such measures would have been resorted to on the arrival of these people as would have effectually prevented the transportation of the cholera poison in their effects half-way across the continent.

Section 2 of the bill provides for the acquisition of the necessary information and section 4 provides that such information shall be promptly communicated to the ports and localities exposed. Such knowledge cannot through its own agents be acquired by the State or by a municipality, and yet upon such knowledge and action does our future immunity from cholera and yellow fever largely depend. The utmost dispatch is an absolute essential condition to the successful and effective execution of the law, and it is accordingly provided that the reports shall be sent direct to the officer charged with the prompt communication of needful warning.

This bill simply provides for the proper utilization of the already existing machinery of the General Government for the protection of the general welfare. The marine hospital service of the Treasury Department already deals with sick seamen, who are usually the importers or first victims of contagious or infectious disease, and its medical officers are necessarily stationed at the ports of entry; and the learning, skill, and indomitable energy of the distinguished gentleman who is at the head of this service, Dr. John M. Woodworth, gives assurance of success.

To the many able published reports of this gentleman upon cholera and yellow fever and to personal interviews, I am greatly indebted.

I know it is customary with some to depreciate the suggestions of medical and sanitary science, denouncing them as empirical and the dreams of theorists.

Let us remember they have always been in the forefront of progress, and that all which has been done for the prolongation of human life has come from that science: quarantine, vaccination, improved drainage, disinfectants, prophylactics, hospitals, character and treatment of disease; besides, it makes subsidiary the whole world of scientific research, and when the nations are lifted from the pit of their ignorance and placed upon the pillar of their grand future no branch of human learning will have contributed more to its glory and happiness than medical science.

Let us make the experiment, and if we fail it will be in one of the noblest efforts that ever science suggested or humanity prayed for. [During Mr. FELTON's remarks, his fifteen minutes having expired, Mr. POTTER said: Does the gentleman from Georgia desire an extension of time?

Mr. FELTON. I do, if my colleague [Mr. HARTRIDGE] and those who are opposed to the bill will have an opportunity to be heard.

Mr. POTTER. I ask, then, that the time of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. FELTON] be extended a half hour.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. I do not think there will be any objection to extending the time of the gentleman; but he only asked in the first instance for a half hour.

No objection was made, and Mr. FELTON continued and concluded his remarks.]

Mr. HARTRIDGE. Mr. Speaker, it is hardly necessary for me to enter upon any extended remarks in reference to the beneficent purpose at which this bill is aiming. I take it for granted that there is no gentleman upon this floor who would not give not only his sympathy, but his aid, his material aid to accomplish the objects which this bill proposes. There is no gentleman upon this floor, and there is no community represented by any gentleman upon this floor which would not cheerfully give its assistance, as he would give it, to prevent the importation of these diseases which have been such a scourge to our country. Many of you gentlemen have never been in contact with this pestilence. Many of you have no knowledge of how prostrating it is, of the injury it does, of the suffering it causes. Nor, on the other hand, are you aware of the benefits that it brings; I say benefits that it brings. For the past experience of those who live in communities which have been afflicted with these scourges is that it has shown us that a touch of nature makes the whole world kin. It has shown us that the people of this country have always been ready to aid with their hearts and their efforts the afflicted of their fellow-citizens.

When this scourge has come upon one of our communities, we have seen the hearts of our whole people throb with sympathy. We have seen money almost without stint poured out alike from the coffers of the rich and the hard-earned hoards of the poor. We have seen men retiring, modest, almost timid in the daily walks and duties of life, assume the full proportions and exhibit all the elements of physical and moral heroism. We have seen even woman, retiring and shrinking by nature and by habit, under the demands of pity and charity, throw aside those coverings of her nature, take part in the battle with pestilence and carry consolation to the sick and to the death-bed of many a sufferer, smoothing the pillow of pain and lighting the pathway of death.

With this experience for us to look to, I know I have no occasion to call upon members of this House to respond with sympathy and with every effort in behalf of the object for which this bill is introduced. The only question to be presented is, is this bill constitutional; have we the right to pass such a measure? And if we have the right to pass it, is it practical in its details and will it be practical in its results? These are the only considerations upon which I propose to touch in the few minutes allotted to me, for they are the only considerations which it is necessary to dwell upon before an audience like this.

I have proposed various amendments to this bill, and for this reason; I did not prepare this bill originally. As gentlemen have heard from my colleague, [Mr. FELTON,] there was a convention held a month since at Jacksonville, Florida, consisting of representatives from all the southern sea-port towns, to consider this question of what they called "national quarantine regulations." They appointed a committee who came to Washington, and after consultation with the medical authorities here they prepared this bill. When the bill was handed to me to introduce, I expressed some objections to it; but as time was essential, and as it was absolutely necessary that the bill should be acted upon at once, I introduced it in its then condition. I have the permission of the Committee on Commerce to present amendments to the bill which will remove from it difficulties and objections which suggest themselves to my mind, and doubtless to the minds of many members on this floor.

We have no right, as this original bill would do, to infringe at all upon the police regulations of a sovereign State. We have no right, as the original details of this bill would do, to interfere with the sanitary or quarantine regulations of any State or of any municipality under the laws and the power and the leave of that State. This is a doctrine which no gentleman on this floor will endeavor to controvert. It is almost as old in its exposition and declaration as the Constitution itself. As long ago as the case of Gibbons against Ogden, in 9 Wheaton's Reports, we find Chief-Justice Marshall, speaking for a unanimous court, a man who always claimed for the Federal Government the extreme powers that any construction of the Constitution could give to it—we find him using this language:

That inspection laws may have a remote and considerable influence on commerce will not be denied; but that a power to regulate commerce is the source from which the right to pass them is derived cannot be admitted.

They form a portion of that immense mass of legislation which embraces everything within the territory of a State not surrendered to the General Government; all which can be most advantageously exercised by the States themselves. Inspection laws, quarantine laws, health laws of every description, as well as laws for regulating the internal commerce of a State and those which respect turnpike roads, ferries, &c., are component parts of this mass.

So that the quarantine regulation is a right which a State has for itself. By the amendments which I propose I do not ask Congress to impair or to antagonize or to interfere in any way with these reserved rights of the States. I propose by these amendments that the Federal Government shall be an auxiliary to aid the laws of the State in keeping out these infectious diseases; that the Federal power shall be exercised only for the good of the whole people, as an aid to the power exercised by the States respectively for themselves.

If gentlemen will listen to me I will show the purport of these amendments. The first amendment is to insert in section 1, after the words "any foreign country," the words "contrary to the quarantine laws of any one of said United States or;" so that the section, if amended, will read:

That no vessel or vehicle coming from any foreign port or country where any contagious or infectious disease may exist, and no vessel or vehicle conveying any person or persons, merchandise or animals, affected with any infectious or contagious disease, shall enter any port of the United States or pass the boundary line between the United States and any foreign country, contrary to the quarantine laws of any one of said United States, or except in the manner and subject to the regulations to be prescribed as hereinafter provided.

Mr. BUTLER. If it will not annoy the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HARTRIDGE] I would ask his attention to line 6 of section 1 of this bill, where it reads "merchandise or animals, affected with any infectious or contagious disease." According to that, until the disease has actually broken out on board the vessel, that vessel could not be "stopped."

Now I need not tell the gentleman, with his knowledge and experience of this disease, that a vessel coming from an infected port may have the disease upon it latent until it reaches the port to which it is destined. Therefore I would suggest to him to insert before the word "affected" the words that "may be." That will give the quarantine officer a little wider range.

The reason why I call attention to this matter is that I once had something to do with the yellow fever. I found that a vessel would come into port without any apparent infection on board, and yet in the course of ten days the disease would develop itself. Now if I could not have stopped that vessel, could not have waited to see whether the disease would develop itself, I would not have been able to protect the city against its introduction. For instance, a vessel would come from Havana to New Orleans—that is a short trip—and during the trip nobody would be sick, yet ten days afterward dozens of those who came on that vessel would be taken sick.

Mr. HARTRIDGE. I think the distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] misinterprets the language of this section. It says:

Whenever any vessel shall leave any infected foreign port—

There the word "infected" applies to the port—or having on board goods or passengers coming from any place or district infected with cholera or fever.

There the word "infected" refers to the place or district, not to the goods or passengers, with all deference to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. BUTLER. If that is the construction, I am content.

Mr. HARTRIDGE. But I am perfectly willing to accept any amendment that may be required to make the provision plain. I am willing to accept any suggestion from any gentleman on this floor that will carry out the view upon which I am now dwelling, that this bill shall not by any of its provisions infringe upon the rights of any State or any community.

My next proposition of amendment is to insert after the word "manner," in the twentieth line of section 2, the words "but such rules or regulations shall not conflict with or impair any sanitary or quarantine regulations of any State or municipal authority."

Mr. COX, of New York. Will the gentleman allow me to suggest to him to insert after "regulations" the words "now existing or that may hereafter be enacted?"

Mr. HARTRIDGE. Certainly. Now, Mr. Speaker, the ports of New York and New Orleans are fully able to take care of themselves. They have perfected a system of sanitary and quarantine regulations, and no friend of this bill has any desire or intention to invade the precincts of their power or to impair the regulations which they have established.

My next amendment is to insert in line 4, section 4, after the word "proper," the words "State, or municipal, or United States;" so that the section will read thus:

That the surgeon-general of the marine hospital service shall, upon receipt of information of the departure of any vessel, goods, or passengers from infected places to any port in the United States, immediately notify the proper State or municipal or United States officer or officers at the threatened port of destination of the vessel.

Now, Mr. Speaker, having shown that we are not seeking at all to impair the rights of States or municipalities under the Constitution, let me call attention to what good this bill will do by making the Federal power and the Federal authorities auxiliary to the State. The information provided for in this bill from consular authorities is an element worthy of consideration. Intelligence is to be conveyed to every sea-port in this country so soon as a vessel leaves a district or place infected with any contagious or infectious disease. This information is not left to come as it now comes, by the slow process and often through the false medium of a bill of health coming with the vessel itself. But it is made the duty of these consular agents to communicate, if need be, on the wings of the lightning, underneath the sea itself, to all the authorities of all seaports of this country, that a certain vessel has left an infected district and is bound for a certain port. Then the authorities, State, municipal, and Federal, are all upon their guard to adopt such measures as will prevent the infection from coming within their borders. This, I say, is enough to arrest the attention of the House, to call for its sympathy, to demand its aid, if the bill contained nothing else.

But, as I have said, there is more in the bill. While New York and New Orleans are able to take care of themselves, many of our southern cities are not. They demand aid from the Government. They petition the representatives of the States to give them assistance through the Federal power. Why, sir, let me take for illustration my own State. Savannah, Brunswick, Darien, and Saint Mary's are all liable to this scourge. In no one of these places have we perfected such a system of quarantine as can protect us. Our past experience, melancholy and mortal in its nature, has taught us that the hand of the Government is necessary to aid us; and this aid can be given without infringing upon the rights of any State or municipality. The Government can enable us to take sick people out of an infected vessel and carry them to Fort Pulaski or some other place near the mouth of the harbor, where there are suitable land and buildings. The Government can authorize us to use its disinfecting machines, to call on its officers in every shape and form in aiding us in doing what, unassisted, we cannot do.

Again, this bill provides that the officers of the State may for this purpose be made officers of the United States, so that they may have all the power of the Federal Government at their command and still be State officers.

Now, Mr. Speaker, this is the simple object and scope of the bill. Its design is to relieve us, if possible, from danger of infection and contagion; to give us new life; to keep away from us that over-hanging cloud of danger which is now threatening us all the time, threatening not only our material interests, but threatening to destroy by thousands the very best of our citizens. This is the sole object of the bill. I intend to make no appeal to the hearts of this House, for none is necessary. I have sought to show the judgment and mind of the House that the measure is constitutional and practicable, and this being so, I think there is no man on the floor who will refuse to give it his vote. At any rate, Mr. Speaker, until I hear dissent, until I hear some argument worthy of refutation against the bill, I shall, so far as I am concerned, leave the measure in the hands of the House.

Mr. JONES, of Alabama. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Georgia who has charge of this bill has advocated its passage on the ground that it is necessary to establish a national system of quarantine in order to protect the Atlantic and Gulf ports against the importation of contagious and infectious diseases. He has described the frightful ravages of yellow fever, and depicted the great destruction to life and property that has followed in its trail. He has told us that the quarantine laws of the several States are inefficient and inadequate. And for these reasons he insists that Congress should establish a uniform and effective system of quarantine as the only reliable means of protection against this terrible epidemic.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I concede that there is a great deal of truth in what the gentleman has said about the fearful nature of this disease; and it may be true that the quarantine laws of the States and of the localities liable to invasions from this epidemic are not altogether perfect.

But, admitting this to be so, does it follow that on this account Congress has the right or power to interpose and pass quarantine laws? Do our powers depend on the failure of the States to exercise powers properly belonging to them? In this country and under our system of government sanitary regulations are purely police regulations. In England they are made by acts of Parliament, and are not police regulations. The English Parliament is said to be omnipotent. It is restrained by no constitutional limitations. It legislates upon all local internal affairs. The Government of the United States is different. It can exercise only such powers as have been delegated. And in one of the amendments to the Constitution it is expressly declared that—

All powers not delegated to the United States are reserved to the States respectively or to the people.

The Supreme Court of the United States in numerous decisions has held that questions like that involved in this bill belong to these reserved powers of the States and cannot be exercised by Congress. In Gibbons vs. Ogden, 9 Wheaton, 203, Marshall, C. J., held that—

Inspection laws, quarantine laws, &c., are a portion of that immense mass of legislation which controls everything within the territory of a State not surrendered to the General Government, all which can be most advantageously administered by the States themselves. No direct general power over these objects is granted to Congress, and consequently they remain subject to State legislation.

The police of the cities and the States of the Union is entirely within the power of the States, and the United States are without any power over the subject. It is not given by the Constitution to the General Government, and it necessarily remains in the States, and the Supreme Court of the United States has held that this power over internal and municipal affairs is exclusively in the States:

That all those powers which relate to merely municipal legislation, or what may, perhaps, more properly be called internal police, are not thus surrendered to the General Government; and that consequently in relation to these the authority of a State is complete, unqualified, and exclusive.—11 Peters, 129.

If, then, this power to frame quarantine regulations has not been surrendered by the States to the General Government, and if moreover it is included among those powers reserved by the States, then there is no warrant or authority for such legislation as that proposed by this bill.

But the gentleman from Georgia contends that the power to legislate for this purpose is derived from that provision of the Constitution which declares that "Congress has power to regulate commerce with foreign nations," &c. But the legislation proposed in this bill is not a commercial regulation in the sense contemplated in the Constitution. It is a mere police regulation.

"Congress may regulate commerce." What is the extent of this power? It comprehends traffic, buying and selling, the interchange of commodities; it may comprehend navigation; Congress, under this provision, may prescribe the rules by which commercial intercourse may be governed. But it is a confusion of terms to say that commerce includes quarantine. If commerce does not include quarantine, if on the contrary quarantine is a matter of internal police, then the Government of the Union has no direct power over that subject and cannot establish a national quarantine system. But if the gentleman can show that this power to regulate commerce includes the power to establish quarantine regulations he would prove too much, for, if this were so, it would follow that the power in the General Government could not be concurrent with the same power in the States but is exclusive of the same power in the States. In the case of Gibbons vs. Ogden, 9 Wheaton 198, 199, 200, &c., it was settled that this power is exclusive in the Government of the United States.

The power to regulate commerce is exclusive in the United States, and if the power to pass quarantine regulations falls under the power to regulate commerce, it must likewise be exclusive in the Government of the United States. But we know that the United States courts in deciding questions of this kind have repeatedly held that quarantine laws, though affecting commerce, are not regulations of commerce. These powers are entirely distinct in their nature from the power to regulate commerce.

These powers are entirely distinct in their nature from that to regulate commerce; and though the same means are resorted to for the purpose of carrying these powers into effect, this by no just reasoning furnishes any ground to assert that they are identical. Among these are inspection laws, health laws, &c., all of which when exercised by a State are legitimate, arising from the general powers belonging to it, unless so far as they conflict with the powers delegated to Congress. They are not so much regulations of commerce as of police; and may be truly said to belong, if at all to commerce, to that which is purely internal. (2 Story on Constitution, sections 1070, 1072.)

The exclusive authority of State legislation over this subject is strikingly illustrated in City of New York vs. Milo; 11 Peters, 102. The defendant in that case was prosecuted for failing to comply with a statute of New York, requiring every master of a vessel arriving to report the names of all his passengers, their ages, &c. It was argued that this act was an invasion of the exclusive right of Congress to regulate commerce. And it cannot be denied that this act affected commerce. But the court held that it was an exercise of the police power properly within the control of the State.

But to contend that because Congress has the power to regulate commerce it can regulate everything that is connected with commerce, such a construction would throw upon Congress a mass of legislation which it could not perform, and the legislative power of the States would be at an end. They would become mere municipal corporations. It would be a stretch of Federal power never dreamed of by the most latitudinarian Federalist. Marshall and Story did much by construction to enlarge the powers of the General Government, but they shrunk from making such a claim as this. Like Aaron's rod it would swallow up the reserved powers of the States.

Therefore it is, Mr. Speaker, that I oppose this bill. I find no authority for it in the Constitution. It has a tendency to centralize power in the General Government. It would add another bureau to the Government, and would be an uncalled-for and unwarrantable interference with the local self-government and the police affairs of the States. The amendments do not cure the defects in this bill. I think I see the poison under its wings.

But gentlemen say the people want this legislation; that they are clamorous for some such protection from the ravages of a disease that assails their lives, health, and property.

Mr. Speaker, this is not the first time people may have asked this Government to do something it has no constitutional authority to do. It is a matter of regret that the people are so forgetful of the true principles of our Government and are so prone to regard it as a paternal government, whose chief object is to relieve them in times of need and in times of distress. Let them be involved in trouble or threatened with disease or vexed with a labor-strike, and immediately they appeal to the General Government for help and protection. This, sir, is not the theory of our Government according to my understanding. The States are clothed with the powers of self-government and they are expected, and it is their duty, to exert these powers to promote the public good and to secure the public safety.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I wish barely to state to the gentleman from Alabama, whose argument I have listened to with great pleasure, that I do not understand the bill now before the House, with the proposed amendments of my colleagues, [Mr. FELTON and Mr. HARTIDGE,] to interfere in the slightest degree with the doctrine and principles laid down by the Supreme Court of the United States in the decisions referred to, or with the doctrine or principles set forth by Judge Story in his commentaries on the Constitution of the United States. That doctrine and those principles are right. This bill does not interfere in the slightest degree with the powers reserved to the States in reference to quarantine notice or inspection laws. Congress has the power to regulate commerce. All this bill does, as I understand it, when amended as proposed, is that Congress, in the regulations of commerce, in reference to which they have the exclusive power, shall not permit vessels coming from foreign ports to bring disease into any ports of any of the States of our Union against the laws and quarantine regulations of the several States. The object is not to violate but to aid the execution of the reserved powers of the separate States. That is all of it.

Mr. JONES, of Alabama. In reply to what the distinguished gentleman from Georgia has said I need only refer to what I have already read from adjudicated cases of the United States Supreme Court, and from Judge Story's Treatise on the Constitution. Judge Marshall and Judge Story never stickled at enlarging the powers of the General Government by construction, and yet they shrunk from asserting such a claim as that Congress had power over matters of internal police. Now, if State or local quarantine regulations should interfere with commerce, Congress may, under its "power to regulate commerce," control or remove these regulations, but it does not therefore follow that it may establish quarantine regulations.

But this bill is very objectionable in another respect. It provides that—

The surgeon-general of the marine-hospital service shall, under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury, be charged with the execution of the provisions of this act, and shall frame all needful rules and regulations for that purpose, which rules and regulations, with the approval of the President, shall have the force and effect of law until modified in the same manner.

This is an abdication by Congress of its power of legislation, and a delegation of that power to a single individual.

If these rules and regulations should be passed by Congress we could see that they were properly passed, that they were in conformity to the Constitution, that they did not interfere with trade, that they did not discriminate unjustly against the ports of any State. The Constitution of the United States, article 1, section 9, paragraph 6, provides

Now, what guarantee have we that this individual, the surgeon-general of the marine hospital, on whom this bill confers legislative powers, will not frame rules and regulations "which will give a preference to the ports of one State over those of another," or that he will not by his rules and regulations "oblige vessels bound to one State to enter at another?"

An act of Congress, to have the force and effect of law, is required to be passed in conformity to rules, constitutional and others, is considered in committee, &c. But these rules and regulations of the surgeon-general of the marine hospital, under this bill, have the force and effect of law without these formalities and safeguards; and then they cannot be modified, except in the same manner.

It is well enough that the consular and diplomatic agents of the United States should be required by law, as provided in this bill, to make weekly reports of the sanitary condition of the various ports where they are located and advise the proper authorities of the departure of vessels from infected places; and this information should be communicated to the various State or local boards of health. But this is as far as the United States should or can go in the matter. I am utterly opposed, for the reasons I have assigned, to the United States Government engaging in this police business. I am opposed to the United States policing the States with soldiers or with doctors.

I yield now to the gentleman from New York, [Mr. COX.]

Mr. SPRINGER. Mr. Speaker, has not the time allotted to this bill expired?

The SPEAKER. By unanimous consent, there was an extension of the time.

Mr. SPRINGER. How much?

The SPEAKER. Thirty minutes.

Mr. FELTON. Or longer.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is advised that five minutes additional were desired.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. I objected to more than thirty minutes.

Mr. SPRINGER. Has not that time expired?

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. It was the understanding there should be an extension only of thirty minutes. The gentleman from Georgia will not deny that. I objected to more than thirty minutes.

Mr. SPRINGER. How much time remains?

The SPEAKER. On that understanding the time will expire twenty minutes past two.

Mr. JONES, of Alabama. I yield now for ten minutes to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. COX, of New York. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman who represents the Mobile district of Alabama [Mr. JONES] has made a very handsome presentation of his views on this question. I remember that one of his predecessors in the first session of the Forty-third Congress, Mr. Bromberg, introduced a bill here for a similar purpose. It had a unanimous report from the Committee on Commerce. It was a so-called national bill, overriding all State regulations of municipal and quarantine laws. It was not unlike this bill, when it was first introduced. It did not reserve any local rights. The author of that bill, as will appear by the debate, (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, first session, Forty-third Congress, page 4562,) urged it on the grounds of mercy. He represented boards of trade. He presented memorials from southern cities, who were imperiled by the terrible visitations of imported plagues. He invoked the national arm. In that arm alone he contended was the remedy. He made sad pictures of the danger and its malignancy. He argued the inadequacy of the local authorities. There were no imaginary fears in his presentation of the dangers, inland and coastwise. He portrayed the poverty of the Southern States. He held that his measure was only an extension of the customs regulations. But his bill had one capital defect. What was it? He forgot the dangers of central or national power; he was oblivious to the grand work of the States and coast cities in protecting our shores.

That bill was fought by me from the beginning of the session to the 4th of June, when it came before the House for action. It was defeated again and again because of its one capital defect. All the objections which have been made by the gentleman from Alabama were made by myself in that debate (page 4564) against that measure. That bill was a purely national or Federal measure. I preferred that no mere bureau or commission should override all local precautions and provisions. That bill went so far as to make it a felony for a quarantine officer to act under a State law. I then quoted the very decisions quoted by gentlemen on both sides, holding that, while commerce in a constitutional sense was exclusively a matter of Federal government, yet our quarantine, inspection, and other laws were peculiarly local in their nature and scope. I referred to the case in 9 Wheaton, (Gibson vs. Ogden,) to the opinions of Webster, Wirt, and Chief-Justice Marshall, that certain health regulations should be of domestic and municipal regulation. I said that "I did not care to discuss then whether the power was concurrent or not." It was enough for me that an amendment I then offered reserved and secured all local rights. No one seemed to deny that the States had ample power to protect by all suitable health laws their inhabitants from imported contagion.

What was the amendment proposed to guard against all trouble on this head? The amendment which I proposed is as follows:

That the provisions of this act shall not be so construed as to apply to the health regulation and quarantine measures maintained by States or municipalities; and such local systems and their appendages shall remain under the control of the respective local authorities.

Mr. Bromberg accepted that amendment. That amendment was adopted. It was incorporated in the bill. No objection was made after its acceptance. The bill passed the House unanimously. It never, however, passed the Senate. Now the new and accomplished member from the Mobile district [Mr. JONES] disclaims any intention or desire to have the Federal Government interfere with their local matters. What has happened since that time? I hope I may congratulate my friend from Alabama that by State laws and domestic regulations they have at last obtained a good local system of quarantine. It would seem so from his satisfaction with his local affairs in this regard and his jealousy of Federal intervention.

The object of my amendment at that time was that the admirable systems of Massachusetts, New York, Pennsylvania, and Louisiana (in the latter established with the aid of the distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BUTLER]) should not in any wise be interfered with by our Federal system. To-day the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HARTRIDGE] who spoke last, with so much grace and sense and to whom must be accorded the honor of the bill, has accepted the suggestion and amendment which I made to him. He thus saved his measure. He has gone further. He holds and he has agreed by his amendment that the Federal system shall be only subordinate and auxiliary to the State system; that these local systems shall not in any way be interfered with by any Federal power. He agrees that neither the laws now in existence with reference to quarantine nor those that may hereafter be enacted shall ever be entrenched upon by congressional legislation. What more can the most careful and logical adherent of State rights desire? What application can be made of decisions looking to State and local supervision as exclusive? Why may we not all agree to assist the unassisted and impoverished cities of the Gulf and South? Groundless are all fears under this amendment, and if it passes I can do, as I did with the former bill in 1874, give it cheerful acquiescence.

I do not care now to consider at length the argument ad misericordiam. I am satisfied we have the power to assist by our Federal instrumentalities the sanitary regulations connected with commerce. When the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. JONES] who last spoke conceded that we might use our consular and diplomatic systems for the purpose of helping and protecting health in this country from foreign plagues, he conceded in my judgment the whole question. He thus at once concedes this Federal authority, in spite of the case of Gibbons against Ogden, in spite of the decision of Attorney-General Wirt, in spite of other decisions jealously guarding State powers, which I quoted at the time of the former argument upon the Bromberg bill. All concede this, by accepting the construction given before and by accepting the amendment I proposed that there can be no collision, but rather much helpful aid between the Federal and State systems for sanitary purpose.

I am not prepared, and shall never be, I fear, to say that the Federal Government ought to take entire charge of this subject. I could not say that to-day, even if there were State failure and neglect. The power may not inhere in the power to regulate commerce. But one thing is sure: that this bill is not obnoxious to the charges made by the gentleman from Alabama. It is not centralization. It decentralizes. I would not disturb in one jot or tittle the splendid local systems of the States, already established or to be established; certainly not that of the great metropolis of this country. It has cost us in New York many years of scientific and medical study and trouble to avert malignant visitants like cholera and yellow fever. It has cost us two or three millions of dollars' expense. We have saved, by our cautious vigilance over vessels arriving at our great port, not only our seaboard cities but the inland towns. By our espionage and careful hygienic system in regard to these quarantine regulations, we have, with unmatched skill and care, contributed to the general welfare.

Quarantine, sir, is nothing new in the history of commerce. It is as old as the fifteenth century, as old as the plagues of mankind. It came out of the old Italian word "quarantina," which, as my friend from Georgia [Mr. FELTON] said, signified forty days. The intention was to save from the ravages of pestilence and contagious disease. It rendered small-pox, fever, and other epidemics innoxious by detaining ships, passengers, &c., until the danger of contagion passed. I hope, therefore, all the objections based upon a refinement of construction of the Constitution as to the commercial powers of a Federal nature and as to the reserved powers of a State nature may be all brushed aside. We should do it for the purpose of reaching the great evil. Since our Constitution was made, steam has developed this country. Railroads run from seaboard to seaboard and compass and traverse all the inland. The course of disease can be traced along the railroad tracks for hundreds of miles into the interior, almost as perfectly as you can trace it within the limits of one block or one square of a city. Time and space have been annihilated, and a new application of government powers seems to be a necessity. Surely this can be vindicated in the light of mercy as well as wisdom.

Let me illustrate: Yellow fever comes from Cuba; it strikes Savannah; next day it may be at Atlanta; then it is found at Saint Louis, and then in Dakota, and where not in this country, owing to the peculiar nature of certain contagions and owing to our vast system of internal communication. Hence, though we may for some purposes have State quarantine regulations—regulations made for one section owing to its situation, exposed to peculiar dangers from peculiar diseases—yet for great general purposes this bill may be immensely useful. What would suit New Orleans, or Mobile, or Savannah would not, perhaps, suit so well the kind of immigration, importation, or shipping that comes to New York or Portland, or crosses the Canadian frontier. Certain local circumstances may require certain local laws and remedies. Therefore, it is wise to unite the Federal with the State system, in so beneficent a work, especially when the Federal is auxiliary to the State system and when the State system is made by this bill paramount to the Federal.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. POTTER] has the floor for five minutes.

Mr. POTTER. Mr. Speaker, no one disputes the importance or the necessity of quarantine regulations. Some portions of the country are more exposed to malignant infectious diseases like yellow fever and cholera than others, and it is said that at the southern Atlantic and Gulf ports there are no sufficient State quarantine regulations. The movement of which the bill now before the House is the outcome was a movement in that section of the United States for the protection of the people of those ports.

As the bill comes here from the committee it provides for a uniform national system of quarantine regulations. It has been said repeatedly in this debate that there are several ports which have already wise and well-matured systems of quarantine regulations, as New York, New Orleans, Mobile, and other ports; and the bill as it is proposed by the committee would break up all those systems and make them subordinate to the system to be established here by this proposed national bureau. Now, it is impracticable to have a uniform system of quarantine regulations, because different places, as my colleague [Mr. COX] has just said, require different provisions; because, further, different ports are differently exposed to infection. The length of voyage which will leave a vessel coming from Cuba dangerous at Charleston may make a voyage at the same time to New York or Philadelphia or Portland safe. And therefore it has been regarded that quarantine regulations were to be considered as police regulations and were to be left to the States. I should therefore consider a bill which proposed to establish a uniform national quarantine system, to override State quarantine regulations, as objectionable and unwise.

But if I understand correctly the force of the amendments which have been proposed here this morning by the committee or by the gentleman from Georgia, with the assent of the committee on Commerce, they are designed to take from this bill this objectionable feature. They make it a system of consular information, and, as the gentleman from Georgia called it, a system auxiliary to and not one controlling the existing State systems. The bill, if amended as proposed, will provide that such regulations as shall be established by this national bureau shall only be operative where they do not interfere with the regulations made by the States and where operative are to be carried out by the State authorities, where the State furnishes authorities to that end. I am inclined, therefore, to think that, if the bill is amended as proposed by the committee and by the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. HARTRIDGE,] by the assent of the committee, it will be found useful in that section of the country where this movement originated and will not interfere with the regulations established by State authorities in cases where the States have laws upon this subject. I have an instructive letter upon the subject from the health officer of New York, which I send to the Clerk's desk to be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

HEALTH OFFICER'S DEPARTMENT,
Quarantine, Staten Island, March 21, 1878.

DEAR SIR: Your note inclosing memorial relative to the establishment of quarantine and a bill based upon the representations of the memorial have been received.

While there is crying necessity for the establishment of some rational system of quarantine so far as southern ports are concerned, its application to this port hardly seems called for. This State is amply organized in that respect, and has all necessary appliances. If you will look at the proposed law you will notice the great power given the surgeon-general of the hospital marine service. He may publish rules and regulations which would so contravene the workings of our law as almost to render it nugatory. So far as his department can impart reliable information concerning the health of infected localities, such information would be very desirable, though we are supposed to acquire the same through the consular bill of health which every vessel is compelled to bring.

Quarantine rules and regulations adapted to one port cannot be blindly applied to another. All of them must be indirectly based upon the time occupied in transit between the two points. One applicable to southern ports, near the indigenous home of yellow fever, would be different from our own. All regulations must be based upon our knowledge of the natural history of the disease, its period of incubation, its modes of transmission, its susceptibility to external impressions.

If, therefore, the action or interference of the General Government in carrying out proper restrictions was based upon the inefficiency or incapacity of the State authorities, and in so far was made subordinate to them, probably a harmony of action would ensue and the different communities be so much the better protected.

It would seem to me better to base action upon some such condition rather than make it as sweeping as proposed in the bill.

Respectfully, yours,

S. O. VANDERPOEL,
Health-Officer.

Hon. CLARKSON N. POTTER.

Mr. POTTER. I only desire, Mr. Speaker, to add that I always feel alarm at any movement to set up a Federal bureau in Washington. No matter how small the beginning of such Federal action, if it is only then as the little grain of sand, it grows year by year. The Federal Government has absorbed already all the printing of the Government, and I do not know but that it will presently absorb the making of arms and shoes and clothing for the Army and Navy. Here is a city of one hundred and fifty thousand inhabitants that exist mainly by the centralization here of Federal expenditure and patronage, and I always feel uneasy at any new movement that may add to this centralization.

I am glad to believe that the gentlemen who have charge of the bill do not intend to lay the foundation by it for more of that Federal expenditure and patronage which has already so aggregated in this city, and I trust that the amendments of the committee and the gentleman from Georgia will be adopted; otherwise I shall feel compelled to oppose this bill.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. HALE. I wish I could agree with the Committee on Commerce and support the bill. I think that the idea of it is that there is a grave and honest apprehension that at certain southern ports some regulations are needed to protect the inhabitants from diseases that may be brought from foreign countries and so far as the measure goes in that direction of course it is meritorious. But, Mr. Speaker, as I examined the bill I am afraid of it, because of the great and unqualified powers that it lodges in the administrative officials of the Government. It is a delicate question at any time to interfere with State legislation where the subject has been taken into consideration by so many States. But when we do meddle in State legislation in matters that have been admittedly given to the States by Federal legislation, we ought to know how far we are going, and this bill is a wide charter to the Surgeon-General of the United States and the Secretary of the Treasury under the approval of the President, to enact what shall have the force of law about which we know nothing.

In the first section it provides that the whole subject-matter shall be under the control of the surgeon-general subject to regulations to be approved by the Secretary of the Treasury with the approval of the President of the United States.

The whole subject is left in that way.

Now, after reading section 1, I followed the bill carefully, expecting to find what regulations we are to agree to, but I find the chart in the last six lines of section 2 in these words:

And the said surgeon-general of the marine-hospital service shall, under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury, be charged with the execution of the provisions of this act, and shall frame all needful rules and regulations for that purpose, which rules and regulations, with the approval of the President, shall have the force and effect of law until modified in the same manner.

Now, Mr. Speaker, throughout the whole bill in its seven sections the whole subject of the entry of vessels, of the restrictions that are to be laid upon them, the number of days that they shall be in quarantine, and the inspection is no more considered in this bill than if the subject had never been brought before the House. It simply provides that the consuls shall report and health officers co-operate; but the subject matter of the bill is turned over to three officials of the Federal Government.

I would not dare, on a question so delicate as this, to trust the Surgeon-General of the United States with these powers, though he may be an able and competent man. I would not dare to trust the Secretary of the Treasury, though he is an able, competent, and high officer of the Government. I am not willing even to delegate this power to the President, although he is chief magistrate of the United States, but when we embark in a question of interfering with old-time usages and old-time regulations, let us have a chart before us; let us know how far we go, so that we may be assured of our safety.

It was said by the gentleman from Georgia that the State authorities are to co-operate with the Federal Government, and that State regulations are not to be interfered with. My answer is, that under the sweeping authority given to the executive officers of the Government we have no guarantee that the regulations established will be such that the State officials can co-operate in. No man can tell but what the regulations of the State may be contravened and controlled by the regulations of the Federal Government, and there may be a conflict of jurisdiction in every State and in every port in the country.

Mr. FELTON. I call the previous question.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. I call for the regular order of business. The time allowed for this bill has expired.

The SPEAKER. The Chair reserved enough time for the sense of the House to be tested upon this bill. The gentleman from Georgia has a right to have the sense of the House tested upon this bill; otherwise it would have no place in the House whatever in the future.

Mr. COX, of New York. Was it not intended that these sections should be read for amendment and for five-minute debate?

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not understand that there was to be debate under the five-minute rule. The understanding was that the sections should be read and amendments appropriate to each section offered and voted upon. The question is upon seconding the demand for the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The bill will now be read by sections for amendment.

The first section was read, as follows:

That no vessel or vehicle coming from any foreign port or country where any contagious or infectious disease may exist, and no vessel or vehicle conveying any person or persons, merchandise or animals, affected with any infectious or contagious disease, shall enter any port of the United States or pass the boundary line between the United States and any foreign country, except in the manner and subject to the regulations to be prescribed as hereinafter provided.

Mr. HARTRIDGE moved to amend the section by inserting after the words "any foreign country" the words "contrary to the quarantine laws of one of said United States."

The amendment was agreed to.

No further amendment being offered, the second section was read, as follows:

SEC. 2. That whenever any infectious or contagious disease shall appear in any foreign port or country, and whenever any vessel shall leave any infected foreign port, or, having on board goods or passengers coming from any place or district infected with cholera or yellow fever, shall leave any foreign port, bound for any port in the United States, the consular officer or other representative of the United States at or nearest such foreign port shall immediately inform the supervising surgeon-general of the marine-hospital service thereof, and shall report to him the name, the date of departure, and the port of destination of such vessel; and the consular officers of the United States shall make weekly reports to him of the sanitary condition of the ports at which they are respectively stationed; and the said surgeon-general of the marine-hospital service shall, under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury, be charged with the execution of the provisions of this act, and shall frame all needful rules and regulations for that purpose, which rules and regulations, with the approval of the President, shall have the force and effect of law until modified in the same manner.

Mr. HARTRIDGE moved to amend the section by adding the following:

But such rules and regulations shall not conflict with or impair any sanitary or quarantine regulations of any State or municipal authority.

Mr. COX, of New York. I move to amend the amendment by inserting after the word "quarantine" the words "laws or;" and also to add to the amendment the words "now existing or which may hereafter be enacted."

Mr. HARTRIDGE. I am willing to accept that amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has no right to accept it; the House may adopt it.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to, and the amendment, as amended, was agreed to.

Mr. O'NEILL. I move to amend the section by inserting after the words "the port of destination of such vessels," near the middle of the section, the words "and shall also make the same report to the health officer of the port of destination in the United States."

Mr. HARTRIDGE. I hope that amendment will be adopted.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HALE. I move to further amend the section by striking out the words "with the approval of the President, shall have the force and effect of law until modified in the same manner," and to insert in lieu thereof the words "shall be subject to the approval of the President."

Mr. POTTER. Let that portion of the section be read as it is proposed to amend it.

The Clerk read as follows:

And shall frame all needful rules and regulations for that purpose, which rules and regulations shall be subject to the approval of the President, but such rules and regulations shall not conflict with or impair any sanitary or quarantine laws or regulations of any State or municipal authorities now existing or which may hereafter be enacted.

The amendment was agreed to.

No further amendment being offered to section 2, section 3 was read, as follows:

SEC. 3. That it shall be the duty of the medical officers of the marine-hospital service and of customs officers to aid in the enforcement of the national quarantine rules and regulations established under the preceding section; but no additional compensation shall be allowed said officers by reason of such services as they may be required to perform under this act, except actual and necessary traveling expenses.

No amendment being offered to section 3, section 4 was read, as follows:

SEC. 4. That the surgeon-general of the marine-hospital service shall, upon receipt of information of the departure of any vessel, goods, or passengers from infected places to any port in the United States, immediately notify the proper officer or officers at the threatened port of destination of the vessel, and shall prepare and transmit to the medical officers of the marine-hospital service, to collectors of customs, and to the State and municipal health authorities in the United States weekly abstracts of the consular sanitary reports and other pertinent information received by him.

Mr. HARTRIDGE moved to amend section 4 by inserting between the word "proper" and the word "officer" the words "State or municipal and United States;" so that it will read, "notify the proper State or municipal and United States officer or officers."

The amendment was agreed to.

No further amendment being offered to section 4, section 5 was read, as follows:

SEC. 5. That the provisions of this act shall not be so construed as to prevent the establishment and maintenance by States or municipalities of port health regulations and quarantine measures, in addition to or furtherance of the rules and regulations established under this act; and such local systems and their appendages shall remain under the control of the respective local authorities; but any local law or regulation interfering with or obstructing the due execution of the national rules and regulations, as approved by the President under this act, shall be null and void.

Mr. FELTON moved to strike out the section.

The motion was agreed to.

Section 6 was then read, as follows:

SEC. 6. That wherever, at any port of the United States, any State or municipal quarantine system may now exist, the officers or agents of such system shall, upon the application of the respective State or municipal authorities, be authorized and empowered to act as officers or agents of the national quarantine system, and shall be clothed with all the powers of United States officers for quarantine purposes, but shall receive no pay or emolument from the United States. At all other ports where, in the opinion of the Secretary of the Treasury, it shall be deemed necessary to establish quarantine, the medical officers or other agents of the marine-hospital service shall perform such duties in the enforcement of the quarantine rules and regulations as may be assigned them by the surgeon-general of that service under this act.

Mr. COX, of New York. I move to insert before the word "exist," in line 2 of this section, the words "or may hereafter;" so as to make it correspond with an amendment already made to section 2 of this bill.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. O'NEILL moved to further amend the section by adding to it the following:

Provided, That there shall be no interference in any manner with any quarantine laws or regulations as they now exist or may hereafter be adopted under State laws.

The amendment was agreed to.

No further amendment being offered to section 6, section 7 was read, as follows:

SEC. 7. That this act may be quoted as the national quarantine act of 1878.

Mr. COX, of New York. I move to strike out that section.

The motion was agreed to.

The last section of the bill was read, as follows:

SEC. 8. That all acts or parts of acts inconsistent with this act be, and the same are hereby, repealed.

The bill, as amended, was then ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time.

The question was taken on the passage of the bill; and upon a division there were—ayes 103, nays 21.

Before the result of this vote was announced,

Mr. HALE called for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered, there being 23 in the affirmative, not one-fifth of the last vote.

So the bill was passed.

Mr. HARTRIDGE moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. RAINEY, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled a bill of the House of the following title; when the Speaker signed the same:

An act (H. R. No. 2371) to amend an act entitled "An act for the support of the government for the District of Columbia for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1878, and for other purposes."

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of its clerks, announced concurrence in the amendments of the House to the bill (S. No. 349) to authorize the commissioners of the District of Columbia to refund a certain tax erroneously collected.

It further announced concurrence in the resolution of the House for the appointment of a special joint committee to meet the body of Hon. John Edwards Leonard, late a Representative of Louisiana, upon its arrival at New York and escort it to the place of interment at West Chester, Pennsylvania, and had appointed Senators JAMES B. EUSTIS, A. SAUNDERS, and SIMEON B. CONOVER as such committee on its part.

It further announced that the President had notified the Senate of his approval of the following joint resolution and bill:

Joint resolution (S. R. No. 21) filling the existing vacancy in the Board of Regents of the Smithsonian Institution; and

An act (S. No. 611) to extend the charter of the Franklin Insurance Company of the City of Washington.

ELECTION CONTEST—DEAN VS. FIELD.

Mr. SPRINGER. I now call up the unfinished business of yesterday, being the contested-election case of Dean vs. Field, from the third congressional district of the State of Massachusetts.

Mr. COX, of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, in the very few moments allotted to me I shall not have time to enter into anything like an argument upon this case. I propose, therefore, to state as briefly as I can the impressions made on my own mind and the conclusions to which I have been brought by an examination of the testimony and of the reports which have been filed.

We have had recently before us a case which in some respects is analogous to this—the case from Louisiana—in which the question chiefly turned upon a recount of the votes which were cast, which recount was had, as was claimed, in accordance with law. In that case I agreed with the majority, that when the question was fairly considered there seemed to be reason why the recount should be held to be final; why it seemed to be accurate; why, on the whole, justice seemed to be done by it. In trying to compare the two cases, and especially in trying to think how gentlemen of candor on the other side of the House would view this matter, it seemed to me that the same reasoning must of necessity bring them to the same conclusion. Here more than there the recount was prompt—much prompter; here more than there it was in accordance with the law of the State; here more than there it was made under a scrutiny which gave both parties full opportunity of knowing whether it was rightfully done or not; here certainly as clearly as there the result is honestly reported by those who made the recount; and consequently the recount ought to be final in this case, if it was right to treat it so in that.

The argument which has been presented in support of the contestant's claim, based purely upon technical law, as I understand it, with regard to the manner in which the United States statute in reference to supervisors of elections would affect the case, is one that I have not time to go into; nor would I care to do so if I had time, because my purpose is not to address myself particularly to gentlemen on this side of the House to whom alone that argument could be addressed, but to present to those of the other side of the House whom I believe to be candid reasons that should influence their action. For I take it that there at least there will be no disposition to strain the construction of a Federal law so as to take away authority from a State, or to bring it in any way into collision with the statutes of Massachusetts. What might be the force of that argument under other circumstances I will not now undertake to say. It does not, however, so far as I have heard it presented, seem at all conclusive to my mind. The Federal law does not annul the election laws of the State, either in terms or by implication, but only provides witnesses to the honesty of the enforcement of State laws for the protection of purity at the elections, and guarantors of redress in case force or fraud shall enter into the election of a member of this House, or other officer to whose case the act of Congress may properly apply.

In this case I may fairly assume, as it seems to me, that the right to a recount is clearly established. Not only gentlemen who have argued from a theoretical stand-point, like the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CANDLER] and other gentlemen on that side of the House, but those who have been all their lives familiar with the question, like the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. HARRIS] who spoke yesterday, have sufficiently shown that here was an instance in which, according both to law and to established custom in Massachusetts, the recount was a proceeding which was common, was well understood by the people, was regular, and was in all respects such a revision of the election returns as occurs every year in that State and in that same city of Boston.

Under these circumstances I have felt that we were justified by every rule of consistency in saying that those at least who believed that the Louisiana case was rightfully determined upon a recount are bound in common honesty to say that the same is true here. I feel that I should not do justice to my own convictions if I failed to say that now, if ever, the question is presented to gentlemen upon the other side of the Chamber whether any case can possibly arise in which arguments from consistency, fairness, and justice shall make them admit that anybody returned as a republican is entitled to a seat upon this floor if it is contested. In this I do not at all overstate the strength of my own feelings; for knowing as I do that no case can arise in which doubt is impossible, I shall be forced to conclude that it is only necessary to give notice of contest and thus make a pretext for the doubt which is to be followed by its determination in favor of the party represented by the majority on the floor.

As proof of the tendency of men's minds to see everything warped by partisan feeling, it is only necessary to refer the House to the manner in which this subject has been treated by the majority of the committee; for I read in the report of the majority that which seems to me to indicate a state of mind so far removed from the judicial balance which I think ought to exist that the mere quotation of portions of their report is conclusive against the fairness of their judgment. I refer now to that portion of the report on page 22 where reference is made to what are called "stickers" or "pasters" in the ballot-boxes, these being, as I presume everybody understands by this time, blank pieces of paper or pieces of paper with names on them, which have been pasted or stuck over the names of candidates upon the ticket in order to change a vote.

The majority of the committee say:

In addition to this, the testimony is that stickers or pasters (that is, the names of the candidates printed on separate pieces of paper) were used in great quantities and pasted over the names of the rival congressional candidates. The testimony also is that these stickers or pasters came off in some cases. And there is a great probability that some did come off after they were counted in the ward room and before the counting of the aldermanic committee.

I desire this statement to be noticed because I intend briefly to call attention to the testimony which the majority of the committee themselves refer to. They say further:

On pages 152 and 153 of the record, Alderman O'Brien testifies that there were a few loose stickers in the boxes with only the names of the candidates on them, the office not being indicated, but the names did not appear to be the names of the contestant or contestee. In some of the wards the changes by the coming off of stickers between the two counts is so apparent that to state the facts is to prove the case.

They then give two cases in which there was a change of one or two votes apparently from one side to the other. In other words, the difference between the second count and the first count must be that which always occurs in such cases, when there were too many votes counted on one side or too few on the other; and having simply shown that the first count gave one or two more votes to Mr. Field in a particular ward than the second, or vice versa, they argue that this proves that "stickers" or "pasters" must have fallen off the ballots after the first count. I think that every gentleman who has read that passage of the report has been led to believe that all that is here said about "stickers" and "pasters" and changes of names in this way, refers to the congressional candidate, with the simple qualification that the names of the contestant and contestee here were not the names that were found upon these loose pieces of paper.

But so far from that being the case the testimony before them, and to which they refer, was perfectly explicit, and in terms declared that this had not reference to the congressional contest at all, but to candidates for other offices upon the tickets at that election. Yet it is from that statement of the case, from that condition of facts, that the argument is made here that we are to conclude those changes were made in this manner, instead of assuming, as is every way most natural and probable, that the changes were owing to the discovery of errors in the first count, as the proper officers reported and have testified.

The House will pardon me for asking members to refer to the testimony on pages 151, 152, and 153. Hugh O'Brien, one of the aldermen, is being examined, and interrogatory 16 is as follows:

Interrogatory 16. Did you satisfy yourself that you counted ~~all~~ the ballots, and did you look to see whether there were any stickers or pasters in the boxes?

Answer. I am satisfied that I counted every ballot. I don't remember that any pasters or stickers were in the boxes for Mr. Field or Mr. Dean. I always looked to see.

Still further along, cross-interrogatory 6 is as follows:

Cross-interrogatory 6. Were there or not loose stickers in the boxes for persons other than those voted for as members of Congress?

Answer. There were a few loose stickers in the boxes for persons other than members of Congress. I don't remember who the persons were.

Still further along he is asked whether he had previous experience in other years in regard to recounting of votes, and he answers that he had, and that at such recounts occasionally stickers and pasters were found in the boxes.

Then cross-interrogatory 12 is as follows:

Cross-interrogatory 12. In your previous counts did you or not find many stickers in the boxes?

Answer. Well, there were always a few stickers to be found in the boxes—as a general thing I should say, not always. These stickers are sometimes put on carelessly and I have known sometimes in counting the votes it would remove a sticker or so.

Mark you, the question is with reference to former years. He has testified explicitly and directly as to the examination of this year. He testified that in this case he examined the whole of the ballots and there were no loose "stickers or pasters" found. What he thus stated as part of his experience in former years the majority of the committee have incorporated into their report in such a manner as to make it descriptive of the election we are now examining, and they use the language of the witness in such connection as fairly to imply they understood the testimony as to careless counting to refer to this year, and the loose pieces of paper spoken of to be those which had covered the name of Mr. Field and had fallen off in the ballot; when in fact the testimony is as direct and fall in denying this as it is possible for language to make it.

The whole passage of the report is so plainly colored by the prejudices of the gentlemen who made it as to give strongest evidence that there was no such fair balance of judgment as ought to have weight in the final decision of the case. If there were time it would be easy to show that the same failure to keep an equipoise is visible in every part of the summing up in the majority report, and that it is not unfair to it to judge the whole from the sample which I have given. [Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. BANKS. Mr. Speaker, a few words will answer my purpose in this discussion. The city government of Boston in 1876 was chosen in the autumn of 1875. It was a government as free from partisan passions or prejudices as any government that ever existed. It was chosen a few months after the memorable demonstration which took place on the 17th of June, 1875, at the celebration of the centennial anniversary of the battle of Bunker Hill. The mayor of the city was a life-long democrat and the members of the two branches of the city government, whether republicans or democrats, were independent men. The city clerk, Mr. McCleary, of whom so much has been said in this discussion, was a sort of Roman officer who had held that position for more than twenty years under republican or democratic administrations, against whom not a word of reproach had ever been uttered and whose official or personal integrity had never been questioned. It was such men as these and the persons appointed by them that were called upon under the laws of the city and State to preside over the congressional election of 1876 and decide the contest between the sitting member, Mr. Field, and my friend, Mr. Dean, who contests his seat.

There never was a more independent or impartial tribunal created for the direction of a national or State election. It would be a singular but not unnatural result if the course of a city government like this, acting under the clearly defined and well-understood laws of the State of Massachusetts for the election of a member of this House, should be considered or settled here upon technical, not to say capitious, grounds, by an absolutely partisan majority on one side or the other. But I hope it will not be so considered or so decided.

What I have to say, Mr. Speaker, concerns, in the first place, the functions of the supervisors of election and the manner in which their duties were discharged in this election now under investigation. Much has been said on the other side in regard to this question, and there is a passage in the report of the majority of the committee which seems to imply that failure of the supervisors to do their duty was sufficient ground to unseat the member whose credentials gave him a seat upon this floor.

I understand the supervisors of election to have been created under the law of Congress of February, 1871, for the protection of the Government of the United States, and not in any sense for the purpose of controlling or directing the action of State officers in the election of members of Congress in the several States. Elections of members of Congress are still to be decided according to the laws of the States, and by the officers appointed under them, and the supervisors of elections are only placed at the polls to oversee and examine, or, as their official title indicates, to "superintend" and to report in the first instance to the chief supervisor and to the House of Representatives through the Clerk of the House the results of their observations and action, the character of the election in which they were engaged, the manner in which the laws were administered, and how far the people were protected in the exercise of their political rights. This is the purpose and the character of the statute of 1871, creating boards of supervisors of election, wherever they should be called for or appointed, according to the provisions of the statute.

That I may not be in error, I will briefly state what their duties were as defined by the law itself:

They were to be appointed in cities and towns of more than twenty thousand inhabitants; to be of different political parties; to be in attendance at the times and places of registration; to challenge persons offering to register or vote who are not properly qualified; to make and verify registration and voting lists; to personally inspect and scrutinize registers; to be at places of election, and at the times and places of counting votes; to remain where the ballot-boxes were kept; to scrutinize the manner of voting and keeping tallies; to personally inspect, scrutinize, count, and canvass each ballot; to make and forward certificates and returns to the chief supervisors; to attach to the register a statement of the accuracy and fairness of the election; to occupy any place at the polls, and to remain there until every duty was completed; to report any interference with the rights of electors; and the chief supervisor, having investigated the truth of these reports, where necessary, was to make his report of the character of the election at which he was stationed to the Clerk of the House of Representatives of the Congress of the United States. These provisions are embraced in sections of the Revised Statutes, No. 2011 to 2019, inclusive.

Now there is nothing in this specification of duties that requires the supervisors to interfere with or control the action, in the slightest degree, of the State officers. The law was not framed for that purpose nor are its provisions intended to produce any such result. Their duty and function is to observe, verify, and report the facts as they occurred. If there is any injustice or wrong in the course of the election they are to take note of it and make a report and in the end bring their report to the House of Representatives, so that this House may act in regard to any election affected thereby or depending thereon exactly as if the members of the House stood at the polls themselves and had observed the process of the election. And their duty ends with the election and the day of the election. The election in question here occurred on the 7th day of November, 1876. There is no doubt that the supervisors, in this case at least, did their whole duty. Nobody complains that they did not on that day do everything that was required. They made their report and they did not say and could not say anything improper took place at that election because it was agreed on all sides it was a peaceful, orderly, legal, and perfectly honest election. The count of votes and the declaration of the result of the polls in the congressional district in question were in favor of the contestant, Mr. Dean, and against the sitting member, Mr. Field, by a majority of something more than 20 votes.

Now it is contended by the committee and by every gentleman who has spoken on the other side that these supervisors should have followed this count beyond the day of election, beyond the closing of the polls; that they were required to go to the board of aldermen and supervise the count made there; and if they were required to go to the aldermen, then they would have been required to go to the governor and council and supervise their count, because the governor and council, under the laws of Massachusetts, have the right to count, and it became their duty to count, these votes, for on the count of the governor and council depends the certificate of election; and because the supervisors did not do this it is argued, in substance, that the election is null and void. That is the argument substantially as it is stated in the majority report of the committee and as it is presented here.

I submit, Mr. Speaker, to the members of the House if any such doctrine as this can be sustained. These supervisors of election are appointed for the protection of the Government of the United States. If they did not attend to their duty they may be prosecuted and punished. If they did not attend to their duty the United States suffers, but the people of the State ought not to suffer, and still less the officers of the State government or its representatives. There is no principle of law upon which you can say that an officer appointed by the Government of the United States, who does not attend to his duty, because of his failure, is to deprive the people of a State or a district of their rights. Why, sir, did they not attend the count of votes made under the laws by the board of aldermen of the city of Boston? Because it was not necessary for them to attend. The election for which they were appointed was ended. What the aldermen had to do was done in the way of a revision of the results of the election as reported by the officers of the election of the State, just exactly as the governor and council had a right to revise the proceedings of the election according to the law and the constitution of that State.

And can it be said that the supervisors have the right to follow up this counting from the election on the 7th of November to the aldermanic count, two or three days after, and then to the governor and council, and thus to secure the election of the man who they thought ought to be elected, or, if they could not secure the election of that man by their attendance, they could stay away and thus defeat the election of his opponent? Is that the law of the United States? And yet that is what the argument of the gentlemen on the other side and the report of the committee assume: that if they fail to attend either one of these counts, on account of that failure the election is void and the sitting member ought not to retain his seat. That is the way in which I understand the argument. And if they are required to attend the revisory count by the aldermen and the count by the governor and council they are equally required to attend here; because this election will not have been ended or settled until we have decided who was elected, and the law requires them to make their report here. Where is their report? They never made any report here. Why not? Because there was nothing of which to complain. The law had been fulfilled. Everything had been done that the law of the United States and the law of Massachusetts required. The election was legal. The whole proceeding was correct and honest, and they had therefore no report to make. And therefore because they make no report these gentlemen say the election is to be void.

Gentlemen on the other side make another point. They say that this second count by the aldermen was not in accordance with the law of the State and that it was not in proper form. The law, as they give it, correctly no doubt, on page 26 of the report, is as follows:

If within three days next following the day of any election ten or more qualified voters of any ward shall file with the city clerk a statement in writing that they have reason to believe that the returns of the ward officers are erroneous, specifying wherein they deem them in error—

there shall then be a recount of the votes. If ten qualified voters make "a statement"—that is the law of Massachusetts—in writing, showing wherein they deem this count to have been in error, they are entitled to a recount by the board of aldermen. That is all. Now, the gentlemen on the other side say because of some failure in the form or the manner in which this statement is presented, there is no validity in the count. Who is to judge whether the statement is sufficient or not, according to this law? Why, the aldermen, to whom the appeal is made. The board of aldermen are to judge whether or not the statement in writing is sufficient. If they decide that it is sufficient and make the count it answers the purpose of the law. The reason the qualified voters assigned for this recount was that Mr. Field had less votes given to him in the count on the 7th of November than he had received, and that Mr. Dean had more votes given to him in the count than he had received, and that an examination and recount of the votes would prove their statement to be true. That was their specification, and the result of the examination and recount showed they were right. Mr. Dean had been credited with more votes than he had received at the polls, and Mr. Field, the sitting member, had received more votes at the polls than the returning officers had accorded to him, and they wanted the record corrected so as to be in accord with the facts. Was it not their right?

That was their specification. The board of aldermen opened the ballot-boxes, as they were required by law to do, and counted the votes and found that that was the fact, that the specification that these ten qualified voters, or more, had made as to different polls was sustained, and that Mr. Dean had received less votes than had been counted for him and that Mr. Field had received more votes than had been counted for him they made that declaration upon that ground, and the certificate was given to Mr. Field.

Now, sir, in this the State of Massachusetts and the city of Boston have done just exactly what has been done in all other matters of the same kind. It does not call for any very specific and exact form. There are gentlemen who seem to have such aristocratic notions as to require that the laws should be so framed that none but an astute city lawyer or some learned jurist, who, as Juvenal says, "takes provoking gold on either side and puts it up," can interpret it. But that is not the idea of Massachusetts. She makes laws so that everybody can understand and administer them, and it is in that spirit that her laws are made and administered everywhere and always.

I remember a case in the supreme judicial court of that State that illustrates that principle. Many years ago, when I was a much younger man, I saw a young fellow apparently from one of the shops in the neighborhood of the court-house enter the supreme court room during the session. He waited a long time and, when the court adjourned and the chief-justice and the associate justices had left their seats, were going out of the court-room, presented to the chief-justice a paper, which the judge received. It was Chief-Justice Shaw, a man who had no superior in his day in that State, scarcely any superior in his own time in any country. The chief-justice said to the young man, "What is this?" He said it was a request for a writ of habeas corpus. The chief-justice said "Why did not you present it to the court during its session?" The boy replied, "Sir, I am not a lawyer." The chief-justice said, "Oh, you are not a lawyer; then come with me, I will hear your case." He might have told him, as these aristocratic gentlemen would have done no doubt, to go to some leading member of the bar and pay him $50 or $100 or $200 to have his petition presented in proper "form." But the chief-justice did not do that. He said in the spirit in which Massachusetts laws and government are administered, "I will hear your case." It is exactly in that spirit that the election laws of Massachusetts are framed and in that spirit that they are administered and they ought so to be accepted by this House. This makes a part at least of her glorious record. It was of such a state that Lord Bacon said:

Her laws are deep, not vulgar; not made out of the spur of the occasion for the present, but out of providence for the future, to the end that the estate of the people may be more and more prosperous, after the manner of legislators in ancient and heroic times.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Speaker, I would that I need not take part in this debate. My judgment and sense of right compel it. There are many things in this case most highly creditable to the Commonwealth of Massachusetts, and there is nothing in it that can call a blush of shame to the cheek of any one of its sons. There is nothing in this case to excite either emotion or passion. There is nothing of consequence in it except to find the right, as we can see and know the right. There is no charge of fraud or intentional wrong against any officer or any parties having concern with this election. There is no possible imputation upon either of the learned and able gentlemen who received suffrages of the people of their district within five votes of each other, upon any count for a seat in this House. There will neither be any disfranchisement of a large constituency by any judgment which we may give here, but five men in majority in any event are not to have their choice. I can therefore see no occasion for heat or for anything but a just judgment.

I do not perceive any occasion for assuming that any claim should be made for a gentleman on the other side of the House who has agreed with this side of the House in his judgment of high patriotism for voting in favor of retaining Mr. Field in his seat, nor do I see any reason why any gentleman on this side of the House, who came to an equally honest conclusion that Mr. Field is not elected, should have any imputation cast upon him. I cannot understand how it is that whenever the republican side of the House vote solidly for republicans we are always patriotic, just, honest, and unpartisan, and whenever, in a similar contest the democratic side of the House votes solidly for one of their own number in an election case they should always be deemed to be partisan, unfair, and unjust, or vice versa. But so it is. When a man steps out from either side of the House, differing with his party in its view of the law or facts in an election case, he immediately gets, or attempts to get, the character of being entirely unpartisan and acting from the highest possible motives.

Now, sir, I am a strong partisan. I am going to speak to this case from a partisan standpoint to sustain a law passed by a republican Congress, for which I fought for two years against a united democracy, to sustain the purity of elections, and I was then sustained by gentlemen on the republican side who now seem, for the purpose of getting one more vote where we have so few, willing to fritter away that law, and argue that it is not binding or of any effect as against State laws regulating elections. To that I desire to enter my protest. If action by officers under our law contravenes action of the State officers in election of members of Congress, the latter must give way.

Before I go further, I desire to say one word right here, and it is, that in my belief all the machineries of election, all the counting, sorting, and declaring of votes, making returns, are all for no other purpose save to reach this result: to show who had by a fair preponderance of evidence the highest number of votes; and when that result is reached I am ready to brush away all the machinery of counting, declaring, or returning votes. That machinery has performed its office, and is useless further, and controls no further.

If I believed upon the fair preponderance of evidence so derived, as it strikes my mind, that Mr. Field received the larger number of votes at this election, he should have my vote to retain his seat here. But I should be very unwilling to be brought to that conclusion upon the ground that the evidence provided for by the laws of Congress and furnished by the supervisors was established to be set aside because that United States law was not made in pursuance of the constitutional power of Congress "to make and alter" State regulations in regard to Federal elections.

What specially attracted my attention to this case was the reading of the report of the minority of the committee, where I found that four gentlemen of the republican side of this House in the exercise of non-partisan views had signed their names to the declaration, after they had quoted the various provisions of the law passed by the Congress of the United States providing for supervisors of Federal elections and prescribing their duties—to the following declaration:

These provisions of law were not enacted by Congress in pursuance of its constitutional power to "make or alter" regulations as to the manner of holding elections for Representatives in Congress.

Now, if I should vote in accordance with this report without entering my protest against this declaration I would be considered as agreeing to that exposition of constitutional law, and I do not mean even to seem to agree to that. There were two sets of laws passed by Congress: one for the enforcement of the right to vote of citizens heretofore disfranchised because of race or color; the other, not made to affect that class of people at all, but to affect cases like the frauds on the ballot-boxes in the city of New York, where Tweed had proclaimed that it was not the ballots but the counting that determined elections in the city of New York. And an election in that city might determine the election of a President, because New York city controlled the State, and the large number of electoral votes of the State controlled or might control the election of President. It was in view of that, in the interest of fair elections, in view of honest counting, that I for one voted for, and the House and the Senate passed and the President signed, a law which provided that whenever any ten citizens believed that there was not likely to be a fair election at any polling-place they could apply to the circuit court—for what? For the appointment by the judge of two supervisors, one of each political party. These supervisors were to be appointed by the judge, a life officer, and they were to stand together at the polls—to do what? To scrutinize every vote cast, to see to the challenges, to count, sort, and return a true account of every vote to their chief, the chief supervisor of election, to be within the potentiality of those officers or bodies having the determining of Federal elections, i. e. to electoral votes and to votes for members of Congress.

That law was in the interest of the purity and fairness of elections. Whatever we may do to-day to attempt to get rid of that law will return to plague the inventors, for some day or other all of us may have to call upon these supervisors, appointed indifferently one of each party, to stand between the violence or passions of a mob, or the frauds of bribed officers, and the true and fair result of the election. Now, I cannot agree that that law is unconstitutional. Yet, believing it to be constitutional, the mere fact that the supervisors are not present on a certain day, or that they were not present when the aldermanic count was made, or anything of that sort, would not stand in the way of my judgment, because all such matters are merely technical, and should not be considered as controlling. But the count of the supervisors appointed under the authority of Congress, selected by the court indifferently from both parties, should be received by this House as the highest evidence until something more than a count by somebody else, afterward made under a State law, is set up in place of this official Federal count.

You may show that these supervisors made mistakes, that they did wrong; you are at liberty to show that. Their count is not conclusive. But, in my mind, it is conclusive against any evidence that is not of a higher character. And a subsequent count by State officers without such is not higher or better evidence. This is what I claim for this count of the supervisors in this case.

It has been said here that these supervisors constituted a sort of a machine by which somebody was to be oppressed. I have given you the whole history and scope of the law; no man will doubt it. Now, whenever a man signs his name to the declaration that it is not constitutional, under the right to alter and regulate by Congress the manner of elections in a State, to pass a law providing for the appointment of officers to see that there is a fair count, then I must make my protest here, now, and ever.

What, then, is this case? There was an election held in this district, precisely as every other election has been held in Massachusetts since 1780, with this single exception that there were no cities in Massachusetts in 1780. And I almost wish that there were none in Massachusetts in 1878; for I believe with Thomas Jefferson, that great cities are great sores upon the body-politic. I have heard here so much talk about the uselessness and want of correctness of a count by ward officers during the day-time on election day, and that we must set aside the count by the ward officers because of want of validity. I go back to the fathers. Here is the provision of our State constitution, made in 1780, which I ask the Clerk to read.

The Clerk read as follows:

ARTICLE 3. Those persons who shall be qualified to vote for Senators and Representatives, within the several towns of this Commonwealth, shall, at a meeting to be called for that purpose on the first Monday of April, annually, give in their votes for a governor to the selectmen, who shall preside at such meetings; and the town clerk, in the presence and with the assistance of the selectmen, shall, in open town meeting, sort and count the votes, and form a list of the persons voted for, with the number of votes for each person against his name; and shall make a fair record of the same in the town books, and a public declaration thereof in the said meeting; and shall, in the presence of the inhabitants, seal up copies of the said list, attested by him and the selectmen, and transmit the same to the sheriff of the county, thirty days at least before the last Wednesday in May, &c.

Mr. BUTLER. Now, that constitutional law, so far as voting in every town in our State is concerned, is the law to-day. Every vote must be sorted and counted on election day, and declared and the return thereof sealed up in the presence of the people before the election is over, or before the meeting is dissolved.

For every town in the State there can be no recount. Now, we have been told that a different principle should apply towards the city. But in point of fact when Massachusetts began to establish cities in 1820 our law, which is a general law, provided that the ward officers should do in the wards exactly what is required of town officers at an election in a town-meeting. In wards everything is done by the ward officers in the same manner as by the selectmen of a town in a town meeting. So that our whole election system, except in cities, depends solely upon the count of votes on election day.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. Will my friend state whether in using the word "towns" he refers to towns proper or to rural districts, known generally as "townships?"

Mr. BUTLER. Our State is divided differently from many others. When we speak of a town we mean a certain territorial district having a municipal government for itself.

Mr. GARFIELD. What we call a township.

Mr. BUTLER. Our town is a regular municipal corporation—what is called a township in some States. It is a municipality, having the entire control of its own municipal affairs. In each of these towns on an election day all the inhabitants of the town having certain qualifications come together at one place to vote. This being the condition of things, when we established cities we required the ward officers of cities to do in the wards precisely what the selectmen do in the towns: to receive, sort, count, declare, return, and seal up the votes before the ward meeting is dissolved. Some gentlemen—notably my friend from Ohio, [Mr. COX,] a member of the Committee of Elections—say that in Massachusetts we have been accustomed all our lives to this recounting process in cities. I beg to correct the gentleman. This custom is not as old as my youngest boy; hardly as old as my eldest grandchild. It is a new-fangled notion which originated lately.

I would remark also that in no congressional district in Massachusetts can there be by law a recount of all the votes cast except in the district under consideration. Why? Because this district is composed wholly of wards of a city, portions of the city of Boston; and all the other congressional districts are composed partly of cities and partly of towns. The recount applies only to cities; there cannot be a recount in towns. Our Legislature will not hear a call for a recount in towns. The constitution is against it.

Under these circumstances how is the election conducted? The inspectors—the ward inspectors chosen by the people and others appointed by the city authorities—go to the polls and hold the election. Two watch the box, one watches the check-list. A man comes up and gives his name; his name is checked off and his vote is put in the box. At intervals of an hour during the day the box is "turned," as it is said; that is, the ballot-box is carried to a table and the votes emptied thereon to be counted. Then the warden and inspectors of elections begin the count. We have a requirement of law that no officer shall give information how the vote stands during the progress of this count, so that A or B may not rally his friends in the afternoon to change the result. The officers silently count. As a rule the unscratched votes are laid aside in packages of 25, as was done in this case. Then the scratched votes are taken up, counted and laid aside in like packages. This process is gone over every hour with each box, the different officers changing from time to time, and revising each other's count until the last hour, when there are usually very few votes cast, during which the count is finished. As soon as the box is turned finally the last votes are counted up, and the return made and declared to the people present, so that they may see whether there has been fair play. The returns of the votes are then sealed up and sent to the city clerk of the city—not to be recounted unless there is some charge of fraud or wrong, but to be tabulated by the city clerk and the tabulated returns sent to the governor and council, who are the final certifying officers in some cases as in the present. My colleague [Mr. BANKS] was, I think, in error in supposing that the governor and council ever count the votes. They examine the tabulated returns and declare the result.

Mr. BANKS. The language of the law is that they shall count the votes.

Mr. BUTLER. But they never see the votes themselves, only the returns. Therefore "counting votes" in Massachusetts means one thing at one time and another thing at another. It is for this reason that I have called attention to this matter. Counting votes at one time means counting ballots, when applied to one set of officers, and making statement of the votes from tabulated returns when applied to another set of officers who have that duty.

We have heard a good deal about the "rough counts in wards." Why, sir, the counts in the wards are exactly the same as the counts in the towns. We have some three hundred and sixty-odd towns—I forget how many, we make them so fast—all holding elections in precisely the same way as do the wards, and none of them can have a recount. But it so happens that this district is wholly in Boston, and there has been a recount here of a congressional vote of a whole district, which can never be done in any other district.

Now, the ward officers swear that they made their official count. In addition to that the supervisors appointed under the law of Congress made a count in all the contested wards, and made a return. The latter count does not vary substantially from that of the ward officers. The result is the same—the election of Mr. Dean. The supervisors then go home and make their return to the chief supervisor. Afterward there was a count by a subcommittee of the board of aldermen, and this last count came out differently from the other two counts. Why? I do not believe the ballot-boxes were tampered with. The "stickers," as they are called, dropping off, or other cause, may account for this different result in one way. One would suppose that three sets of men could count these ballots, which did not amount to only about two thousand, without any substantial difference in the result. Impressed with this idea, since this case came up I have been searching to find any explanation how this discrepancy in the count could have happened without fraud being imputed. I do not believe that Alderman O'Brien or any other of the board of aldermen would deliberately falsify the count. The question is upon what principle did they count? Did both ward officers and aldermen count on the same basis? We have official reports of all the doings in the board of aldermen. I hold in my hand a copy of that official report, under date of November 15, 1876, nine days after this election was held. The question came up between Alderman Stebbins, the chairman of this subcommittee who counted Mr. Dean's votes, and Alderman Thompson, who was on the other side, as to the theory on which the committee counted votes at this same election. It does not appear whether they were talking about these votes but about this very election, and the manner in which they recounted the votes given at this election. As to the manner of the official recount by the aldermen, I will send and have read the following from the official record.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. Alderman THOMPSON. I would like, for my own information in regard to those returns of votes, to know whether it was not the custom of the committee in counting those votes where the name appeared with no office designated, whether it was their custom to strike it out and count it as a blank. I would ask the chairman of the committee to inform me upon that subject.

Alderman STEBBINS. Whenever a name upon a ticket was covered by a pasteur in such a manner that the office could not be designated or seen by the committee, it was treated by the committee as a blank vote and not counted.

Alderman STEBBINS. The cases he cites are not the same. I stated that whenever a ballot was so pasted as to entirely cover the office for which somebody intended to vote, the committee rejected it. The committee could not know whether it was for one office or another. It was utterly impossible for the committee to know the office under the pasteur without tearing it, the pasteur covering up not only the name but the office. In the other case the office was plain.

Mr. HISCOCK. May I interrupt the gentleman from Massachusetts?

Mr. BUTLER. If the House will only give me time enough.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUTLER. I cannot at present, but I will deal with what you wish to refer to. I am going to deal with that point. I shall do no good to attempt to deceive the House by omitting it.

Now, then, Alderman Stebbins was chairman of this subcommittee who recounted the votes here, and he tells us whenever a pasteur was so broadly pasted on as to cover the name of the office for which the candidate ran, then they counted that vote as blank. I have a vote here, one of the original ballots of Mr. Field, [holding up the paper to be seen by the House.] I have one of the original ballots of Mr. Field, and you will see "Walbridge A. Field" is in large type, and "for Representative to Congress" in small letters close to it above, between those two black lines. Now, then, I want to vote for Mr. Dean, for instance. I put a sticker, as it is called, with Dean's name on, paste it over Mr. Field's name, but so wide as to cover up "for Representative to Congress," and I would have to be careful if I did not, because "for Representative to Congress" is close to Mr. Field's name in small letters. Alderman Stebbins says, though, I may paste Benjamin Dean's name over Walbridge A. Field's name in the place on the ballot made for the congressional vote and where the alderman knows what is under it as well as Alderman Stebbins knows his own nose—[laughter]—he says he counts that a blank. And there were forty-four blanks found by the aldermen. The ward officers did not return nor do the inspectors return any.

Now my friend who is so anxious to interrupt will remember that I have not forgotten his point at all. Alderman O'Brien was called as a witness. Nobody asked him how he made blanks by counting. All he said was there were forty-four blanks. I wish my friend from Ohio to remember this: in the recount for Representative the aldermen returned forty-four blanks. The ward officers returned none. Now, Mr. O'Brien says—

The SPEAKER. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. BUTLER. How much time have I had?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman's thirty minutes have expired.

Mr. SPRINGER. If the House will allow the gentleman from Massachusetts to continue the same length of time will be given to the gentleman from Maine on the other side.

Mr. MCCOOK. I object.

Mr. SPRINGER. The gentleman cannot object, for I will move the previous question at such time as I desire. Under the rule the gentleman from Massachusetts has an hour, and can proceed.

Mr. BUTLER. Who follows me?

Mr. SPRINGER. The gentleman can proceed.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois has handed to the Chair a list, and the allotment of time to the gentleman from Massachusetts is marked down at thirty minutes. That time has now expired.

Mr. SPRINGER. That does not prevent me extending the time if I postpone the hour at which I shall demand the previous question.

The SPEAKER. In that case the Chair would feel obliged to give an equal amount of time to the other side.

Mr. BUTLER. I am content, sir. I will not trespass unnecessarily upon the time of the House. But I will take a moment out of my time to thank the gentleman from New York for the high compliment he pays me by interposing his single negative in the attempt to gag me. [Laughter.]

Now then I was about saying that Mr. O'Brien swears—

Mr. MCCOOK. Mr. Speaker—

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Massachusetts yield?

Mr. BUTLER. No, sir; I object. [Laughter.]

Mr. MCCOOK. I wish to say—

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts is entitled to the floor.

Mr. MCCOOK. Mr. Speaker—

Mr. BUTLER. I object.

Mr. MCCOOK. Well, Mr. Speaker, I ask—

Mr. BUTLER. I object. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from New York rise?

Mr. MCCOOK. I made the objection to the gentleman from Massachusetts continuing. I supposed that that was all that was necessary to do. But I did not persist in it. I now renew that objection.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is too late.

Mr. MCCOOK. How was I taken off my feet?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman was never on his feet through having any title to the floor. He did not even persist in his objection.

Mr. MCCOOK. I had a right to object.

The SPEAKER. Only in the mere matter of an objection to the extension of time; as to which there was subsequently an amicable arrangement between the two sides, and the Chair stated he would feel himself obligated to give to the minority of the committee an amount of time equal to that granted to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. MCCOOK. Can the Chair do that over my objection?

The SPEAKER. That was done by an arrangement of the House, and the House has vastly greater authority than the Chair in that respect. In fact every power.

Mr. MCCOOK. I do not know what right the gentleman from Massachusetts had to say that I desired to gag him.

Mr. BUTLER. I object to a speech from the gentleman.

Mr. MCCOOK. The gentleman objected the other day when I wished to vote; the most discourteous thing ever done in this House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts has the floor.

Mr. BUTLER. Tantane animis celestibus ira? [Laughter.]

I was about saying, Mr. Speaker, that this Alderman O'Brien swears when he was examined some months afterward before the committee to account for these blanks, that he thought they were only blanks where the names of persons voted for, for Representatives to Congress, were cut out or scratched out. But the difficulty with that proposition is, if this had been the case, then the ward officers would have been bound to have noticed these same cuttings and scratchings as blanks. But the ward officers may have acted, and I have no doubt did act, upon the true theory; where they found a pasteur over the Representative to Congress, with the name of Benjamin Dean or the name of Walbridge A. Field on it, they counted that for either, as the case might be.

Now gentlemen on the other side say that cannot be so, because there are only a very few more votes found with the exception of two packages, one containing 25 votes for Dean and another containing 25 votes for Mr. Field in the fourth district. So that Alderman Stebbins was in this condition of mind: he counted 25 votes for Walbridge A. Field for the fourth district, where he was not nominated for member of Congress, which the officers of the election would not count, and Stebbins would not count votes for Walbridge A. Field at all when his name was pasted over the place where Congressmen were voted for, if the pasteur did not disclose what office Field was running for. When the vote disclosed that he was a candidate for an impossible office, Stebbins would count the votes thrown for Field, but when this vote was for Field to an office he might fill, then Stebbins would not count it unless the voter said what the office was. That is, when the voter said he voted for Field for an office for which he could not vote for him, then Stebbins counted the vote; but when the voter did not say the wrong office, then Stebbins would not count the vote. Now this, in my judgment, shows me it is safest I should stand, as the fathers of the Commonwealth stood, on the constitutional first count in open town meeting, done by the officers where there is no fraud alleged, and that witnessed by the supervisors of election where both sets of officers, State and Federal, agree substantially. Now the question becomes one of probabilities and nothing but probabilities upon this evidence. Well, when I was a boy, Mr. Speaker, we used to insist when there was any mistake made to be governed by the best two in three. When any one said, "That is not fair," the answer was, "Try it over again; the best two in three." Here are two counts made at the times before they ought to be made, by State and Federal officers—the stickers had dropped off—made in open town meeting, with the whole people looking on. Those two counts agree. An after-count was made by a committee of the board of aldermen through Alderman Stebbins, who declares that he counted on an entirely technical and unjust basis. This last count altered the result 5 votes; it might have been 40. Now I had rather, for my part, pin my faith on the supervisors and the ward officers in their accuracy than pin my faith on the man who says he will not count votes for a candidate, although he knows, for he cannot help knowing, for whom the voter intended to vote, and returns those votes as blanks only when they were not blank votes, because they had a name upon them of a candidate before the meeting.

I think the balance of evidence is this side of the question; and it is upon that evidence only can we act. This is all there is before us to satisfy the judgment.

I do not ask any of the gentlemen on the other side to put it as an unpartisan judgment, a high act of stepping out of the lines of party on an election case, and thereby getting great glory as a judge; because it is no such thing. I am a strong partisan. I look upon this question as a partisan question, and it is a partisan question; unless my friends upon the other side will agree it is best for the whole of this country that we should have an overriding law in every congressional district to see to it that every man votes just once and no more, and his vote is counted just once and no more for the man for whom it is given. I think that is right to all and just to all, and in good time every man will agree it is good for all. Certain it is if we made that law for partisan purposes, our man is the first man that got squeezed by it; so it would not seem worth the while to make a law or overthrow it for any such purpose. Make laws to compel what is right and for the good of the whole and then live up to them. Therefore I take the ward counts made by from eight to twelve men, each counting over these ballots, as against the count of three men made afterward and acknowledged by one of them to be made on a wrong basis.

Thanking the House for their courtesy with one exception, I have no more to say.

Mr. FRYE obtained the floor.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maine by the agreement has control of forty minutes.

Mr. FRYE. Mr. Speaker, like the distinguished gentleman who has just preceded me [Mr. BUTLER] I do not believe that we are all patriotic if we vote together on one side, or that all ought to be damned who vote together on the other side; but, sir, I do believe that when this House has committed to its Committee of Elections evidence in a contested case covering perhaps two thousand closely written pages of matter, and that committee has gone over that testimony by its subcommittee, it does not involve partisanship on either side of the House to stand by the report of its own side. I do not blame the democratic side, nor do I charge it with being partisan, if seven democrats on the committee, after hearing and investigating thoroughly an election case, report unanimously in favor of the contestant or the contestee and they sustain that report, and I do not blame the republicans for standing by the four republicans on the committee if they unite, yet I bristle all over with prejudice against the democratic party. Neither do I claim that I am to be elevated into the great high priesthood of conscience because I see differently from the whole of my side, differently from all the republican members of the committee. We are engaged on other committees and it is utterly impossible for us to investigate for ourselves each case. We must depend upon those of the Committee of Elections in whom we have confidence.

Sir, the report made in this case is not that of which I have been speaking. This case was committed to the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. SPRINGER,] the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. CANDLER,] and the gentleman from New York, [Mr. HISCOCK,] as a subcommittee. They examined it with great care. They heard all the testimony. They heard all the arguments, and two of them reported in favor of Mr. Field, one [Mr. SPRINGER] in favor of the contestant.

Now, what I say is this: that fact ought to put the democratic side of this House to a careful, thorough, and complete examination of the evidence and of the law of the case; and if they cannot afford the time to make that examination, it ought at least to provoke doubts in their minds as to the right of the contestant to the seat, and the sitting member, having the prima facie case, should have the benefit of those doubts.

The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CANDLER] has had the reputation of being a fair man in this House, and I will not say that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] has not had and is not entitled to the same reputation. I certainly would not say it if I had not heard his speech the other day. But that speech either emanated from blind partisan prejudice or from profound ignorance of the law. Why, sir, he maintained deliberately here upon the floor of this House that under the existing law in the State of Massachusetts, disregarding entirely the supervisor law, there could be no recount, under any circumstances, of the votes in those ballot-boxes. Said he, all that they can have a right to do is "to examine," no matter what the allegation is in the case, even though it be that 200 votes were not counted in one ward or that all the votes were miscounted; the gentleman insisted that the only power of the aldermen under the law was to examine the votes—look at them, I suppose.

Mr. SPRINGER. I hope the gentleman does not wish to misrepresent me.

Mr. FRYE. No, sir.

Mr. SPRINGER. I stated that there might be allegations sufficient to require the aldermen to examine even all the ballots.

Mr. FRYE. I asked the gentleman if they did not have the right to recount the ballots, and he said no, only to examine them; and he says no more now.

I now take one step further. I am very sorry, indeed, to be obliged to charge the gentleman from Massachusetts, my personal friend, [Mr. BUTLER,] with partisanship; and yet I must, or else refrain entirely from charging the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] with partisanship. I think I shall risk charging the gentleman from Massachusetts with it for the purpose of pursuing my argument against the gentleman from Illinois. I heard the gentleman's speech. I did not hear one word in that speech, not one word, in relation to this matter which the gentleman from Massachusetts thinks he has sprung upon this House. I did not hear the gentleman from Illinois quote in the House the words of Alderman Stebbins which have been repeated to-day by the gentleman from Massachusetts, and yet upon taking up his reported speech I find that a member of the committee, the gentleman who had the majority report in charge, and I presume drafted it, deliberately stepped away outside of any evidence or arguments in the case and repeated the language of Alderman Stebbins made in relation to the senatorial count in one of the districts of the city of Boston, and not in relation to the count of the vote for Representative in Congress, and that he quoted it with this introduction:

I find in the official proceedings of the board of aldermen of the city of Boston an explanation by Alderman Stebbins, one of the committee who made the aldermanic count in this case, which explanation throws much light upon the recount. Alderman Stebbins said:

"Whenever a name upon the ticket was covered by a poster in such a manner that the office could not be designated or seen by the committee, it was treated by the committee as a blank vote and not counted."

And then he commented on it, as follows:

This explanation, stated in different words, is this: Wherever a poster had by accident covered the greater portion of the letters on the ticket designating the office, the aldermen regarded the designation of the office as erased and returned the ballot as a blank. Just how many ballots were found in this condition is not stated by the alderman in that connection; but on pages 184-7 of the record will be found Alderman Stebbins's minutes or tally sheets kept during his aldermanic count. A careful examination of the tally lists will show that the aldermanic committee found forty-four ballots which they returned as blank as to a candidate for Congress. Just how many of these blanks appeared on democratic tickets does not appear; but it is in evidence that Mr. Dean's friends used a great number of posters during the election, and the differences which the aldermen make in the count can be explained upon this hypothesis more clearly than in any other way. The ward officers evidently counted the ballots so as to give effect to the intention of the voters, and where Mr. Dean's name was found pasted over the place on a republican ticket where the office of Congressman was designated, even if the greater portion of the designation of the office should be obscured by the poster, the ballot must doubtless have been counted for Mr. Dean. But the aldermanic committee, in counting the same ballot according to the rule laid down by Mr. Stebbins, would return such a ballot as a blank. Here we have a partial explanation of the differences of the respective counts, and if we are to give effect to the intentions of the voters, the ward officers' count and the count of the United States supervisors, made before the result of the election could be known, is entitled to the greater weight.

Now I submit if it is not a fair implication from that remark that the gentleman found that somewhere in this case? The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] did not find it in the case, but he may have found it in the speech of the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. SPRINGER.] The gentleman from Illinois did not find it anywhere in the case. I assert upon my honor as a member of this House that I have examined this testimony, and that nowhere from the beginning to the end is it to be found. I have read these arguments and I assert that nowhere from the beginning to the end of the arguments is there any allusion whatever to this statement made by Alderman Stebbins. Nowhere was it before the committee; nowhere was it before the House; nowhere was notice given of it, and nowhere could notice have been taken of it. It is brought in aliunde, entirely outside of the case on trial; it is forced in here improperly and unjustly. Now I submit, does not this indicate partisanship at least on the part of the member of the Committee of Elections who had the majority report in his charge, and ought it not to put the democrats disposed to seat Mr. Dean on guard?

Mr. SPRINGER. Will the gentleman allow me—

Mr. FRYE. Oh, yes.

Mr. SPRINGER. I read from the same papers that the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CANDLER] read from in his remarks in this case; the identical papers. One was used frequently before the committee, and has never been disputed as an official record of the board of aldermen of the city of Boston.

Mr. FRYE. Did you read it in your speech?

Mr. SPRINGER. I did not.

Mr. FRYE. That is what I thought.

Mr. SPRINGER. But I took the liberty of inserting it in my speech when I came to revise it, as is often done by members, and notably by the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. WALSH] who addressed the House yesterday.

Mr. FRYE. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] thought he had invented or discovered this bonanza. But the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] had shrewdness enough to beat the gentleman from Massachusetts at his own game and to discover that bonanza first!

Mr. SPRINGER. I claim no right of pre-emption.

Mr. FRYE. Now, if the gentleman from Illinois, instead of bringing into this case something which was entirely outside of it, which had no business here whatever, had seen fit to take the testimony which was before the committee, and had read that in connection with his remarks, perhaps I would not have been justified in saying that he was partisan in his statements. He knew perfectly well that Alderman O'Brien had testified distinctly and positively before the committee in relation to these blank votes; and that Alderman O'Brien alone of the witnesses before that committee was questioned upon that point. Does the gentleman think that Mr. Dean would not have discovered that if it had taken place? Would not O'Brien have discovered it; would not Alderman Viles have discovered it? They met there and discussed step by step every question raised. Would not the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] have discovered it if it had taken place? Would not the counsel of Mr. Dean, Judge Abbott, have discovered it? Would it have remained deep in the bosom of silence and secrecy to be found only in the room of the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. SPRINGER,] where he wrote it out as a part of his speech, if it ought to have had any existence as a fact in the case now on trial?

I call attention to the testimony of Alderman O'Brien in regard to blank votes:

Cross interrogatory 13. What is meant by the word "blanks" which appears on your memorandum of the count?

Answer. In every ballot there were more or less votes where the name for Representative to Congress was scratched out with a pen or pencil, or sometimes cut out, and no other name substituted.

Cross int. 14. Will you state as nearly as you can the number of those blanks which you found, and the wards in which you found them?

A. In ward 29 I should say—blanks, five; in ward 21, nine; in ward 24, two; in ward 13, four; ward 14, five; ward 16, eight; in ward 17, (presumed to be 17,) four. That's all I can tell from my memoranda.

Cross-int. 15. How many of those blanks were cut, as well as you can recollect?

A. Very few, so far as my recollection goes; my impression is a large portion was marked with a pencil; in fact, that is the convenient way of altering ballots at the ward room.

Now I submit that is the only testimony legitimately before this House; it is the only testimony whatsoever in relation to blanks before the Committee of Elections. And neither the gentleman from Illinois nor the gentleman from Massachusetts is at all justified in bringing that outside matter before this House after the testimony in the case has been closed. Why did they do it? Didn't they think to take the friends of the contestee entirely by surprise and thus gain an unfair advantage? It proves an inglorious failure.

I desire to make a part of my remarks an affidavit signed by Alderman Stebbins, and I will ask the clerk to read it. It was taken since the gentleman from Illinois sprung his trap and before the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] set his.

The Clerk began the reading of the paper, but was interrupted by Mr. SPRINGER, who said: I rise to a point of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. SPRINGER. I submit that this case has been heard and the evidence all submitted to the committee, [laughter,] and that it is not in order for the gentleman from Maine [Mr. FRYE] to introduce into this case ex parte evidence when it is being argued in the House. The gentleman himself will not say so. If it was done in a court of justice any judge presiding would prohibit it being read. And we are here acting as a court, and the gentleman has no right to introduce an affidavit of one of the witnesses in the case for the purpose of influencing the judgment of this House. [Great laughter.] I make that point of order. The record to which I referred was the record of the official debates and proceedings of the board of aldermen, and as much a public record as the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of this Congress. But this paper is evidence in no sense of the word.

Mr. FRYE. Mr. Speaker, the debate to which the gentleman refers was not at all in relation to the election of Representative to Congress; it was a debate in relation to the election of senators in the State of Massachusetts. Besides I make this affidavit a part of my speech, and it certainly relates to the case I am discussing.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Illinois make a point of order?

Mr. SPRINGER. I make the point of order that in settling this question we are acting as a court, acting in a judicial capacity, and that to introduce new evidence at this time is not in order, is unprecedented; and I do not think the gentleman from Maine will insist upon it.

Mr. GARFIELD. I insist that my friend, Judge SPRINGER, cannot object to Judge FRYE making a speech, even if he should read a document as part of it.

Mr. SPRINGER. I have not appealed to the judge from Ohio; I have appealed to his honor the Chair.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks it is not within his power to prevent the reading of a respectful paper, which a member of this House may desire to have read as a part of his remarks. The House itself can judge as to the propriety of its introduction as well as the Chair.

The Clerk resumed the reading. The entire document is as follows:

Deposition of Solomon B. Stebbins.

I, Solomon B. Stebbins, having been duly sworn, do depose and say that among the ballots counted by me as alderman of the city of Boston on the 10th and 11th of November, 1876, in compliance with the petitions of voters in the third congressional district, asking for a recount of the votes cast for member of Congress in that district, were certain ballots reported as blanks and voted as blanks in the memorandum produced by me and annexed to the deposition given by me in the contested election case of Benjamin Dean vs. Wallbridge A. Field. These blanks were the ballots of both political parties where the name of either Mr. Dean or Mr. Field had been erased generally by pencil or had been cut out by the voter. In some instances ballots were found where the entire lower portion of the ballot had been cut off, leaving only the presidential electors and gubernatorial candidates or simply the presidential electors. These ballots were recorded by the committee in the count for Representative to Congress as blanks. There was no case, to the best of my recollection, where a paper containing either the name of Benjamin Dean or Wallbridge A. Field was so pasted over the ballot as to cover the name of the office for which he was voted for, that is to say, Representative to Congress, and I know that no vote was counted a blank on that account. The pasters were in no instance large enough to cover the space occupied by the names of the candidates and the office, the printing of both the names of the congressional candidates and the office being in good-sized type. I am confident an inspection of the ballots themselves will show this.

My attention has been called to certain remarks made by me in the board of aldermen November 15, 1876, quoted by Mr. SPRINGER, as published in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, in which I was discussing the election in the second State senatorial district, the contest being between Marcellus Day and Caleb Rand. Certain ballots were cast in this district which did not appear to have been prepared by the regular political parties, but in the interest of Manning, a candidate for the court clerkship, and was voted largely in that district. This ticket contained the words "For senator, Marcellus Day" in such small type and the office and name so closely compacted that an ordinary paster for Rand covered both name and office. I have been able to find one of these ballots and annex it to this affidavit, marked A W W.

It was to this and this only that my observations in the board of aldermen applied, as the succeeding paragraphs in the record of the debate will show, and not to the contested election between Messrs. Dean and Field. There was no vote in the whole count which bore the name of Benjamin Dean either printed as part of the original ballot or upon a paster which was counted as a blank, or which was not counted for Benjamin Dean as member of Congress.

SOL. B. STEBBINS.

Mr. FRYE. Now take the testimony of O'Brien, take the testimony of Stebbins, and I ask the House where is the evidence against it. If the argument is to rest, as the gentleman from Massachusetts rested it, upon this point alone, where stands the case in the minds of fair men? Says Stebbins: "No vote was counted a blank because the name of the office was pasted over." Says the gentleman from Illinois and the gentleman from Massachusetts: "The whole difference comes from these blanks." Is it difficult to see who has the right of it?

The gentleman from Massachusetts went one step further. He stated that he had looked all around to see how the discrepancy between the ward count and the aldermanic count could have happened, who was right and who was wrong; and he had found conclusively who was wrong and how. He found conclusively that the aldermanic count was wrong, because Alderman Stebbins, in talking about a senatorial vote, declared that there were some 44 blanks which were not counted.

Now if you turn to the evidence you will find that taking the vote of Mr. Field and Mr. Dean together, they received 26 more votes each than the whole count of the ward officers gave to both of them. If those 44 blanks occurred by reason of names being covered up, then 44 were stricken out; and that would reduce the aggregate count of these two men by 44. But instead of that the count increases the vote of each of them 26. What then becomes of the gentleman's "conclusive" theory on this point.

But, says the gentleman from Massachusetts, "I care nothing about this case; I only speak in behalf of the supervisor's law, the law of the United States; I want to save that." Why does the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] also suddenly become so anxious about this supervisor law.

Mr. SPRINGER. Because it is the law of the land.

Mr. FRYE. Because it is to save Mr. Dean, the gentleman thinks; and the gentleman is asking his democratic associates on this floor, (though every one of them who was in the Congress that enacted the law declared squarely that it was unconstitutional, and I have no doubt every one of them to-day if asked privately would declare it unconstitutional,) is asking them in order to save Mr. Dean to declare the law constitutional; and many of them are prepared to do it. The gentleman from Massachusetts is supplicating the republican side for Heaven's sake not to declare this law unconstitutional. A singular dilemma we are getting into, we on this side declaring that law unconstitutional, and you democrats declaring it constitutional—we declaring it unconstitutional in order to seat Mr. Field, you declaring it constitutional in order to seat Mr. Dean. What valuable men these gentlemen from Massachusetts must be on the floor of the House to entitle them to this immense consideration at our hands.

Now, I join issue with the gentleman from Massachusetts. I say that the minority of the committee have never asserted anywhere, from the beginning of their report to its close, a sentence, a line under which the gentleman from Massachusetts is justified for a single moment in declaring that the minority of the committee held this law to be unconstitutional; nor is there an intimation in the arguments made by Mr. Field's counsel capable of being tortured to this end. What do the committee say?

These provisions of law were not enacted by Congress in pursuance of its constitutional power "to make or alter" regulations as to the manner of holding elections for Representatives in Congress.

"To make or alter" being in quotation marks. To what does that refer? It refers to the provision in the first article of the Constitution. Now, sir, the Constitution of the United States has been amended again and again. When as the result of the logic of war we believed we were compelled to give the black man the ballot—I sometimes wish we had not given it, because to-day it is only putting increased power into the hands of the South and none into the hands of the colored men—fearing that the rights of the colored man under the amendments of the Constitution would be interfered with we enacted this law authorizing supervisors, not for the protection of New York City, as the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] asserts. If the law was designed to protect New York City, what is the meaning of this clause which I find in the law?

Supervisors of election appointed for any county or parish, on the request of any ten citizens, shall supervise the elections, &c.

What is the meaning of this language, if the law was made for New York City alone? I say that the supervisor's law (and the declaration of the committee goes no further than this) was not passed under the first article of the Constitution. The fourteenth and fifteenth constitutional amendments, both designed to protect the rights of citizens of the United States, require Congress to enact the necessary legislation to enforce those rights, and this law was enacted in response to those requirements.

I believe this law was the result of a necessity which Congress believed to exist; that it was passed in order to enforce the fourteenth and fifteenth amendments to the Constitution of the United States. This committee say no more than that. They do not declare it to be unconstitutional. I believe it to be constitutional, and so does every republican on this floor. What was its scope? I doubt not the gentleman from Massachusetts has defended it on the stump. I have many times. You on that side of the House have attacked it on the stump over and over again, and what has been our reply to you? It was this: that the United States Government in that law was simply putting itself near the ballot-box; that these two supervisors were to be the Government's eyes and ears—eyes to see wrong and ears to hear wrong—the eyes and the ears of the Government of the United States. And for two purposes: first, to deter from crime at the ballot-box and, secondly, if crime was committed to bear testimony against the criminals. I say in my judgment that was the only purpose Congress at that time had.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I will call the attention of the House for a moment to the discussion when the law was passed. That law was discussed before the House extensively, and Mr. Kerr, Mr. Cox, Mr. Voorhees, and almost every prominent member on the democratic side declared the law to be unconstitutional. Mr. Cox asked Judge Bingham, who was chairman of the Judiciary Committee having the bill in charge, this question:

Mr. Cox. Will my friend say that the laws of Massachusetts and Rhode Island are not changed by this law?

Mr. BINGHAM. That question has nothing to do with my position. It does not touch the matter I am discussing. There is not a law of any State regulating an election which is not left in full force and effect by this bill.

That was at the time the bill was introduced from the Judiciary Committee into the House and in answer to the question of the gentleman from New York. The intent, the purpose of the law, was then known, and Judge Bingham then declared when the bill was under consideration that it did not interfere with any law or any regulation of any State of this Union; that such was not its purpose.

What did it do then? It put, as I said, the Government's eyes and ears at and near the ballot-box, so that crime should be prevented.

Mr. SPRINGER. Let me call the gentleman's attention to section 2018 of the Revised Statutes, in which it is provided "to the end that each candidate for the office of Representative or Delegate in Congress may obtain the benefit of every vote for him cast, the supervisors of election are, and each of them is, required to personally scrutinize, count, and canvass each ballot," &c. What crime does that prevent or punish?

Mr. FRYE. The gentleman has discussed that himself. His argument is before the House and I will waste no time on it. The gentleman from Massachusetts said he would be willing to disregard the law provided he was satisfied Mr. Field had a majority of the votes cast. So say gentlemen of the committee.

The gentleman from Massachusetts says how is it that the aldermanic count should be more perfect than the count of the ward officers? How is it the fathers did not provide for recounts? Were they not content with one count? The supervisor law, which the gentleman thinks so much of, was not the creation of the fathers. There has been some improvement since the days of the fathers, notwithstanding we insist on the dollar of the fathers. [Laughter.] Why is it to-day in Massachusetts they provide for recounts? The law is created from necessity, demanded by experience. The very fact the law is made is as strong an argument as we can have that circumstances existed in Massachusetts which absolutely required its enactment.

But let me say it is in evidence here that in the thirty-eight recounts made during the last four years no one of the ward counts was found to be correct. You remember when Mr. Abbot, the contestant for Mr. Frost's seat—

Mr. CHALMERS. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. FRYE. I cannot stop right here. When Mr. Abbot was contestant for Mr. Frost's seat, he sought this same remedy in Massachusetts. He went from the wards to the board of aldermen, demanding a recount. He did it in a form not nearly so formal as the one the gentleman from Illinois objects to in this case. The recount was had. Correction after correction was made, but not enough to seat Judge Abbot, and he came in here on a question of fraud in some Navy votes. In every election in the city of Boston of every officer there has been a recount, and the ward counts have never been found correct.

I will now summon as a witness Mr. Dean himself. I have the report of an authenticated election case where Benjamin Dean was chairman of the committee and made the report. Mr. Dean says:

It is impossible to compare the returns of the ward officers in this case with the count made by the city clerk and his assistants, for the committee, without a feeling of deep solicitude for that almost fireside right, the right of the citizen of each ward to have their elections presided over by officers of their own choosing. It is a valuable right and justly prized; but a continuance of such inexcusable errors will weaken our regard for it, and will tend to the introduction of appointed in the place of elected officers; or it will reduce their duties to the mere ministerial one of receiving ballots, and devolve the counting and declaring of them upon others. Already, by the act concerning elections in cities passed in 1863, an important step has been taken in that direction. Unless care is taken to elect capable officers, and greater correctness is found in their returns, we shall in vain deprecate interference with the right of the people to choose those officers for themselves, we shall in vain point out the danger of giving the appointment of those officers to persons already in office. The power is now with the people, where it belongs; and all they have to do, to retain it, is to prove their appreciation of its value by the efficiency of the officers of their choice.

The justice of the foregoing remarks is manifest from the following comparison of the two counts:

Names of candidates.	Count by ward officers.	Count by city clerk.	Difference.
William H. Palmer.....	193	258	55
Lewis Rice.....	178	243	63
N. J. Bean.....	256	327	61
William C. Burgess.....	214	275	61
P. H. Farren.....	308	361	53

In heaven's name, gentlemen, was not Mr. Dean right when he said that there needed to be provision of some kind or that there would be provision of some kind by which correct count should be made? And Massachusetts, finding an absolute necessity existing, provided by this law for a recount; and to-day the ward count is worse than it was before the law was enacted, because it relieves the ward officers from all responsibility. In the heat of the moment, to answer the demands of impatience, they come as near as they can. They count in haste to announce the result within half an hour after the polls are closed. They know they are to be followed, if it is a close election, by a recount. Every recount shows the inaccuracy of the ward count and shows the necessity of a recount. And yet the gentleman from Massachusetts thinks that these ward officers, assisted by supervisors who only testify that they actually counted in two wards, are correct. We must remember in this House when we judge of that question that two of these men who made that recount were democrats and one was a republican; we must remember that all three knew absolutely that the election of Mr. Dean or Mr. Field depended, as the gentleman from Massachusetts said, upon four or five votes. They must have known that absolute certainty of that count must be had, and they testify one after the other how they made it. With regard to the necessity of the count, let me give further testimony. Mc Cleary says:

Recounts have been had of the original ballots by the proper officers every year since the passing of the law in 1867 in this city. In most cases there is a variation, more or less, between the two counts; it would be very seldom that they would concur in any one ward in the count and recount. (Page 119.)

O'Brien says:

My experience has been that they seldom agree. (Page 157.)

Stebbins, who had been a member of the committee to recount ballots for three or four years, says:

These recounts recur every year, usually at the national, State, and city elections, the last occurring at a different time from the two former. There is usually a discrepancy of a few ballots in every ward, sometimes reaching a number large enough to change the reported result of an election. (Page 134, inters. 25 and 26.)

Dickinson says:

It has seldom happened that a recount of votes in a ward has tallied exactly with the count of the ward officers. (Cross-int. 4, p. 144.)

Now, I submit that, under all the circumstances, the count on election day, the count in the presence of the multitude, an excited multitude, the count, knowing that a recount will be made, is not entitled to any reliance whatsoever as compared with that made after the fact, made when all the circumstances are known, made when the counters are to elect by their count one or the other of these gentlemen to Congress; that it was not half so reliable, even though it had been made, not by a division of parties, but by three republicans.

Mr. SPRINGER. I now move the previous question.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question was ordered.

Mr. SPRINGER. I yield the floor to the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. HARRIS.]

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia, rose.

Mr. GARFIELD. Was not the hour of the gentleman from Illinois used at the opening of the debate?

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. No, sir; there was an equal division of time and an hour was left on our side, which I propose to occupy in closing debate.

Mr. GARFIELD. By the ruling of the Chair, as I understand it, when a gentleman in charge of a bill uses his hour in opening he is not entitled to an hour after the previous question is seconded.

The SPEAKER. The Chair did not decide that point in regard to a running debate, which covers days. If the gentleman from Ohio will examine the decision he will find it as the Chair states. This is by an agreement that there should be an equal time given to each side, and should always be so arranged.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. We have tried to run the debate so as to have an equal time for each side.

The SPEAKER. It will be remembered that the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CANDLER] had his time extended. The Chair would suggest to the gentleman from Ohio to read the decision to which he referred.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I am very reluctant to occupy the time of the House at an hour so late as this; but the position I occupy compels me to do so, and at the same time makes me speak under great embarrassment. In the discussion of this case I desire and hope I shall have the attention of the House, especially of those gentlemen who have doubts as to how they will vote; for I think when this question is understood fairly and impartially that no gentleman of the political party to which I belong can hesitate as to his line of duty.

I admit, sir, technically speaking, these are judicial questions. But when we reflect on the mode in which cases are brought before the Committee of Elections, when we reflect that a committee of this House is required by its duty to examine a case covering fourteen hundred pages, which no member of the House has time to examine, unless he is a member of the committee; when we reflect that the democratic party must look to this committee to think, to digest, and to report for them, while the republican party look to their Representatives on the committee to do the same for them—it is not surprising then that gentlemen take sides according to the reports of their respective friends upon the subject.

Then, sir, it is no evidence of partisan spirit that gentlemen find themselves upon opposite sides in such cases. I admit there are cases when the scale is so equally balanced as regards the evidence, and the law is so uncertain that a man's political prejudices will turn the scale though he is perfectly honest about it. And I respect the man who, having no information on the subject and not being in a position to acquire it, follows the lead of those of his own party who have the time and the opportunity to examine and report upon the case. All should be honest; all should strive to do right, and all seek the truth, but, as Pope says,

"Tis with our judgments as our watches, none
Go just alike, yet each believes his own."

My friend from Georgia [Mr. CANDLER] said he had nothing to say to those who would vote as partisans. I indorse that sentiment and add, to those of either party who make up their minds without reading the record or understanding the case and who are looking for excuses to deviate from the line of their party on frivolous pretexts, I have nothing to say, because, Mr. Speaker, when I remove one objection they will find another.

Again, my friend and namesake from Massachusetts [Mr. HARRIS] said yesterday that if this were a close House, where one vote might decide the result, he would expect a party vote, or in other words he would expect Mr. Field to be unseated and Mr. Dean seated. I tell him that if he looks to the history of this House he will find that he is mistaken. With but one single exception, in every case which has come before the House every republican has voted for the republican, while we have a number of democrats who usually vote to seat the republicans and against the party recommended by their committee. We have some democrats who have voted twice in three votes for republicans, and after they shall have voted to-day, will be three times for republicans to once for a democrat. Thus my friend will see if parties were very close in the House the republicans, by the aid of democrats would always win, while the republicans, like drilled veterans, never break.

Mr. Speaker, I shall show in this case that Mr. Dean is entitled to his seat, not by virtue of the Federal count, but by virtue of the State count, and there is where the error sprung up. That was the point at issue between the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] and the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CANDLER.] The gentleman from Illinois is in favor of the Federal law being supreme and controlling the State law. I do not concur with him in that, neither does the gentleman from Georgia, and therefore we split on that issue, and then my friend from Georgia did not go further into the facts of the case to see if Mr. Dean had been elected by the State count. That was the diverging point. The error is in the supposition that the committee rely upon the Federal count and not upon the State count. I do not do it. I rely upon the State count and the State count alone. But I ask my friends upon the republican side of the House to reverse the picture. Suppose that the State count had given a majority for Mr. Dean and the Federal count had given a majority for Mr. Field, would not they assert that the Federal law was supreme? My friend from Massachusetts, [Mr. HARRIS,] who spoke yesterday, said that the supervisors are not required to make any returns. They are required, under the law, to make a return to the general supervisor and he is required to make a return to the House of Representatives, and that return is here under the operation of the law; but, as I have said, suppose that the Federal returns had elected Mr. Field and the State returns had elected Mr. Dean, where would our friends on the other side be. I venture to predict that they would be in favor of the Federal returns.

The returns of the United States supervisors are in evidence and they show Dean is elected by 4 majority, thus corroborating the ward count, which shows the same. Now, I submit that these returns of the United States supervisors being before us, we are bound to take notice of them, and as to what weight they shall have I leave each gentleman to judge. According to my view it is not necessary to rely on them to elect Dean, therefore I will not discuss that branch of the question. But I will show from the law and evidence that Mr. Dean was elected under the laws of the State. I will first show that there was no authority for the second count, and then I will show that the second count was not made in pursuance of the laws of Massachusetts, and I want my democratic friends, who stand upon State rights, to listen to me.

I will here quote the election laws of Massachusetts as applicable to the mode of counting:

Sec. 15. The votes in elections for national, State, county, and district officers shall be received, sorted, and counted by the selectmen, and by the ward officers, and public declaration made thereof in open town and ward meetings. The names of persons voted for, the number of votes received for each person, and the title of the office for which he is proposed, shall be entered in words at length by the town and ward clerks in their records. The ward clerks shall forthwith deliver to the city clerks certified copies of such records, who shall forthwith enter the same in the city records.

Sec. 17. City and town clerks shall, within ten days from the day of an election for Representatives in Congress, transmit copies of the records of the votes, attested by them, certified by the mayor and aldermen or selectmen and sealed up, to the secretary of the Commonwealth.

Sec. 4. If within three days next following the day of any election ten or more qualified voters of any ward shall file with the city clerk a statement in writing that they have reason to believe that the returns of the ward officers are erroneous, specifying wherein they deem them in error, said city clerk shall forthwith transmit such statement to the board of aldermen or the committee thereof appointed to examine the returns of said election. The board of aldermen or their committee shall thereupon, and within five days, Sunday excepted, next following the day of election, open the envelope and examine the ballots thrown in said ward, and determine the questions raised; they shall then again seal the envelope, either with the seal of the city or a seal provided for the purpose, and shall indorse upon said envelope a certificate that the same has been opened and again sealed by them in conformity to law; and the envelope, sealed as aforesaid, shall be returned to the city clerk. Said city clerk, upon the certificate of the board of aldermen or their committee, shall alter and amend such ward returns as have been proved to be erroneous, and such amended returns shall stand as the true returns of the ward.

I say that the second count was not made in conformity to the laws in any particular, and I challenge my friend from New York [Mr. HISCOCK] to contradict me if I am wrong in the statement I am making. I allege in the first instance that the second count was not only not made in compliance with the law, but that not one of the requirements of the law was complied with. But admitting that it was, I will show from the evidence that the second count was unreliable because it was made in such a manner as to render it impossible that it could be correct. I will show that Alderman Stebbins and his committee counted ten thousand votes in nine hours, and that there were three counts going on in the room at the time; some members of the committee were counting the senatorial votes, some the congressional votes, and as a question of fact it can be shown that the first count was more reliable than the second.

I maintain the second count was not authorized by the law of Massachusetts, because the proper foundation had not been laid for it, and I do not wonder that my friend from Maryland [Mr. WALSH] refused to be interrupted yesterday, because he argued as if any ten men had a right without cause to have a recount. The law which I have quoted says that they shall specify wherein the returns are erroneous. I will now give the statement in writing made by the ten qualified voters under the fourth section:

To the CITY CLERK of the City of Boston:

The undersigned, qualified voters of ward 13, in the third congressional district, hereby state that they have reason to believe that the returns of the ward officers of said ward for member of Congress in said congressional district at the election of November 7, 1876, are erroneous, in that all the ballots cast for Walbridge A. Field as member of Congress were not counted and credited to him, and that more ballots were credited to Benjamin Dean as a member of Congress than were cast for him; and they ask for a recount of the vote of said ward for member of Congress, in accordance with the provisions of section 4 of chapter 188 of the acts of the year 1876.

Now, the chairman of the republican committee in Boston says that he wrote this certificate in his own office and sent it out to the various wards for signatures. He said that it was his duty, not because he believed there were errors, but that it was his duty to the republican party to have a recount. He wrote the papers and sent them out, and when he was interrogated and asked if he knew of any errors, he said "I knew of none; but there was a possibility that in so large a count there might be some mistake." Was that within the spirit of the law?

If the law intended to give a peremptory and absolute right for a certain number of electors to demand a recount, why impose conditions? But when conditions are imposed and are not complied with, then the recount goes for nothing.

I will now proceed to show how Massachusetts understands this law for a recount by the adjudications made by the very body which enacted the law. In political matters the construction given by the Legislature of laws passed by themselves certainly ought to have great weight, and I invoke the members from Massachusetts to listen to me and, if I am wrong, to correct me. The Legislature of Massachusetts has adjudicated this question ten to fifteen times, and in every case they have said the closeness of the vote is not sufficient ground for a recount. I have the cases before me but have only time to quote the following:

January 20, 1872, in the case of Burt vs. Babbitt, the rule was laid down and adopted as follows:

The rule is this: That, in the absence of any proof or evidence of fraud in the acts of the selectmen, or of illegality in the manner of calling, holding, or conducting the meeting at which the election is held, or in the manner of ascertaining the election of Representative, unless the petitioner shows a reasonable ground for supposing an error in the count as made and returned by the selectmen other than the mere fact of there being but a few votes between the number thrown for the contestant and the sitting member, the committee will not recount the ballots that may have been preserved.

No other evidence, therefore, having been offered before your committee in support of the petitioner's claim other than the fact that there is but four votes difference in the number of votes cast for William Babbitt, the sitting member, and the contestant, the committee report that the petitioner have leave to withdraw.

T. M. CARTER.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, April 21, 1877.

The foregoing report was accepted in the house of representatives January 22, 1872.

W. S. SOUTHWORTH,
Assistant Clerk Massachusetts House of Representatives.

In the case of Davis vs. Murphy, February, 1872, the House committee report as follows:

No evidence was introduced to show fraud or that the ballots had been tampered with previous to the recount by the aldermen, but your committee were of the opinion that if they overlooked this violation of the law and judged that the aldermen had a legal right to recount the ballots, it would be establishing a dangerous precedent, tending to uncertainty and fraud in elections. Therefore, believing that the recount by the aldermen was illegal, and it was tampering with the ballots, your committee are of the opinion that it would be neither right nor just to take the recount by the aldermen as the correct result of the election; neither would it be right or just to take the ballots as they now are, purporting to be some and all that were cast at the last State election in the third Essex representative district, and count them at the present time.

I will not detain the House by reading the other cases. They but reaffirm and requote the doctrine just read.

And yet gentlemen tell us, gentlemen who are State-rights men, that they go by the State count. Then if you go by the State count you must take the construction that the State puts upon its own law and not force a construction that does violence to the law.

Mr. HISCOCK. Does the gentleman say that any court or Legislature of Massachusetts has decided that under this law the closeness of the vote is no reason for a recount?

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. The Legislature of Massachusetts has admitted—

Mr. HISCOCK. Understand my question. Do you say that they have decided that under this law—I do not mean under the general principles applicable to a recount—that under this law they have decided that the closeness of the vote is no reason for a recount?

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. I say that since the passage of this law—

Mr. HISCOCK. The gentleman does not answer my question. I will concede that it was since the passage of this law; but were they construing this law?

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. I will answer my friend if he will allow me. They construed this law in the various cases to which I have referred. So they go on through eight or ten cases. The last case is where they opposed the aldermanic count. It is a case where the aldermanic count was before the Legislature, where they had opened the envelopes and recounted the ballots. And when you speak of envelopes in this case, it means nothing but a ballot-box a foot square. They decided that the recount was illegal and tampering with the ballot. That is what the Legislature decided.

Mr. HISCOCK. Will the gentleman allow me again?

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. I have but an hour.

Mr. SPRINGER. Do not be interrupted.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. I will yield to the gentleman, for he is always perfectly fair, though very adroit.

Mr. HISCOCK. Does the gentleman know that that language was used with reference to the legislative examination by a legislative committee, and not with reference to a committee of aldermen?

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. The aldermanic count was before the Legislature for revision, as the aldermanic count is before this House for revision in this case. They said that it was illegal in another case, (and recollect it is the Legislature of Massachusetts that is speaking.)

Now there is a case precisely in point, where they say that the count was illegal and void because no error had been alleged in the notice applying for a recount. Now having shown that the recount was unauthorized, I will run a parallel for a moment as a matter of fact. I am glad to see my friends on both sides of the House listening to me, and especially my friend from Maryland, [Mr. WALSH,] who yesterday rose above the claims of party and assumed the high stand-point of an impartial statesman. He said he would copy into his speech all the testimony on both sides. I read his speech this morning, and I find he has copied the evidence so far as it sustains his views, but the evidence on the other side he has left out. I will show that as I proceed, and he cannot gainsay it. He had the floor yesterday and would allow no interruption. I have it to-day, but I will not do him injustice.

Now, Mr. Speaker, we come to the question of the reliability of the two counts, and we must decide between them. I will premise by saying, all else being equal, I would give credit to the count which was made at a time and under circumstances which are free from all temptation to fraud. Two men of equal character and standing make directly opposite statements touching the same transaction. One has neither motive nor feeling to do wrong, the other has every possible motive which could influence the human mind to make a wrong statement; which would you believe? Who can hesitate to believe the former? The first count was made at ten different places at the same time, when no one knew the result of the election, for it had not been ascertained. The second was made some days after the election, at one time and by the same parties. Then they knew that a change of 4 votes would elect Field and perhaps decide the complexion of the House in the Forty-fifth Congress, for, it will be remembered, for some days after the election it was undecided which party would have a majority in this House. Therefore the latter had the strongest temptation to err.

First, let us look at the manner in which this ward count was made. Let the officers of that election speak for themselves. D. P. Sullivan says:

The system was, the warden, clerk, and one of the inspectors did the counting. The warden and clerk were present at the counting of each lot taken out, and the inspector was absent when one lot was being counted. After they counted all the ballots for all the candidates on the tickets, they tied the ballots together; they had the republican ballots in one lot and the democratic in another and the prohibition in another, and they tied a string round each bundle, and marked on each bundle, on a ballot, the vote for Mr. Dean and for Mr. Field; then they were handed to the supervisors, Mr. Swinson and myself. Mr. Swinson would count the ballots and I would watch him, and after he got through he would hand them over to me and he would watch me counting. In some cases I counted them over two or three different times to see if the figures compared with the ward officers' count, and each time I found them to be correct.

I cannot read all the testimony in this case, but if I do not quote it correctly or quote it partially I call upon my friends to correct me.

The ward officers are required, one hour after the polls are opened, to begin the count. Remember Massachusetts has eight officers at each voting-place, enough to record and count the votes at the same time. They go over them again and again, the ballots passing through several hands.

They are then passed over to the United States supervisors, consisting of one democrat and one republican at each voting-place. They in turn count them. If any discrepancy is discovered they retrace their steps, count them over and over until the error is detected and their sheets tally. That is what was done in this case at each of the ten wards constituting the congressional district. Moreover, Mr. Speaker, these ward officers had more time than the aldermanic committee, as I will presently show. They had from early morning until night to count an average of less than 2,000 votes, for the count goes on all day. The whole vote of the district in round numbers was 20,000; divided into ten voting-places would give an average of 2,000 to each. There were ten officers at each voting-place, making one hundred divided into squads of ten. Thus each ward had the whole day in which to count 2,000 votes; and while these several officers were thus counting, each ward separate and distinct from the other, they did not know that the aggregate of their several counts would elect Dean by 4 majority; hence they were free from all motive of fraud or wrong in the premises. To prove these ward counts correct I will read the testimony in part on that subject, and I desire to call especial attention to the fact that there is no conflict between democratic and republican witnesses:

Deposition of William Swinson.

APRIL 19.

WILLIAM SWINSON, a witness for Benjamin Dean, the contestant, being first duly sworn, in answer to interrogatories proposed by S. A. B. Abbott, esq., of counsel for contestant, testified as follows, namely:

Interrogatory 1. Please state your name, age, residence, and occupation.
Answer. William Swinson; fifty-nine; 76 Rutland street, ward 18; merchant; am out of business now.

Int. 2. What office, if any, did you hold on November 7, 1876?

A. United States supervisor in ward 18, to represent the republican party. I had lived in the ward thirty-five years; have been warden and inspector when it was ward 11; have not been much of a politician since the old whig party.

Int. 3. Did you attend at the polls on that day, November 7, 1876, and discharge your duties?

A. I did.

Int. 4. Did you carefully count the ballots cast for Representative to Congress in that ward?

A. I did.

Int. 5. Did Mr. Sullivan, the other United States supervisor, also carefully count the same ballots?

A. I think he counted a good part, or was there present most of the time. I can't say whether he personally counted all the votes; I have an impression that he did.

Int. 6. What ward officers counted the ballots for member of Congress?

A. The warden—I think only one person at a time, with the assistance of the clerk—they kept a very correct method, a regular debit and credit account, so that there was no chance for mistakes. One inspector also counted, and as they were counted they were passed to our table and we counted. The whole counting was done by two persons at a time; the others were attending at the boxes.

Int. 7. Did the counts made by you and Mr. Sullivan agree with that made by the ward officers?

A. They did.

Int. 8. How long have the warden and clerk been ward officers in ward 18?

A. That I cannot state positively; I think three years.

Int. 9. Were they or not persons fitted for performing the duties required of a warden and a clerk?

A. I think they were; have no doubt of it.

Deposition of Charles B. Hunting.

CHARLES B. HUNTING, a witness for Walbridge A. Field, the incumbent, being first duly sworn, in answer to interrogatories proposed by J. Lewis Stackpole, esq., of counsel for the incumbent, testified as follows, namely:

Interrogatory 1. State your name, age, residence and occupation.

Answer. Charles B. Hunting; forty one; Boston, Massachusetts; ward 16; clothing dealer.

Int. 2. Were you acting as clerk of ward 16 at the election of November 7, 1876?

A. Yes, sir.

Int. 7. State who acted as United States supervisors in said ward at said election.

A. John F. Daly and Abraham J. Lamb.

Int. 8. State whether said supervisors personally scrutinized, canvassed, and counted the ballots for Representative to Congress cast in said ward at said election.

A. They counted them; can't tell how carefully they scrutinized them.

Cross-examination resumed:

Recross-interrogatory 6. You counted all the ballots in your ward as carefully as possible, did you not?

Answer. Yes, sir.

Recross-int. 7. Did you not believe, after the count was finished, that the returns made by you to the city hall represented the true number of ballots cast in your ward for Mr. Dean and Mr. Field, respectively?

A. I did.

Recross-int. 8. Don't you now believe the count made by you is the true count of the votes cast for Mr. Dean and Mr. Field, respectively?

A. I believed it then, and believe it now.

Deposition of Abraham J. Lamb.

APRIL 20.

ABRAHAM JOHN LAMB, a witness for Benjamin Dean, the contestant, being first duly sworn, in answer to interrogatories proposed by S. A. B. Abbott, esq., of counsel for contestant, testified as follows, namely:

Interrogatory 2. What office, if any, did you hold in ward 16 on November 7, 1876?

Answer. United States supervisor of election, representing the democratic party.
Int. 3. Did you attend at the polls on that day and faithfully discharge your duties as such supervisor?

A. I did.

Int. 4. Did you count the ballots cast for member of Congress carefully, and make a true return of the number cast for each candidate to the chief supervisor?

A. Yes, sir.

Int. 5. Did Mr. Daly, the republican supervisor, also count the same ballots?

A. He did.

Int. 6. Have you any doubt that you counted for Mr. Dean and Mr. Field all the ballots actually cast for them, respectively?

A. I have none.

Int. 7. Did you know of any error or mistake being made in this ward on November 7, 1876, in the count and return of votes cast for member of Congress?

A. No, sir; I did not.

Cross-examination by William G. Russell, esq., of counsel for Mr. Field, the incumbent:

Cross-int. 1. Did you discover any error in the count of the warden and clerk?

A. No, sir.

Cross-int. 2. Did you remain until the ballots were put into the boxes and sealed up?

A. Yes, sir.

Deposition of John F. Daly.

APRIL 20.

JOHN F. DALY, a witness for Benjamin Dean, the contestant, being first duly sworn, in answer to interrogatories proposed by S. A. B. Abbott, esq., of counsel for contestant, testified as follows, namely:

Interrogatory 2. What office, if any, did you hold in ward 16 on November 7, 1876?

Answer. United States supervisor of election, representing the republican party.
Int. 3. Did you attend at the polls in ward 16 on November 7, 1876, and faithfully discharge your duties as United States supervisor?

A. To the best of my knowledge and ability I did.

Int. 4. Did you count the ballots cast for member of Congress carefully, and make a true return of the number cast for each candidate to the chief supervisor?

A. To the best of my knowledge and belief I made an accurate count, and returned the same to the commissioner, the chief supervisor.

Int. 5. Did Mr. Lamb, the other supervisor, also count the same ballots?

A. He did.

Int. 6. Have you any doubt that you counted for Mr. Field all the ballots actually cast for him?

A. None whatever.

Now, Mr. Speaker, having disposed of the manner in which the ward counts were made and having offered the highest evidence of their correctness, let us consider for a few moments how the second or committee's count was made.

McCleary, clerk of the court, says:

Interrogatory 8. How did the committee proceed to count? State fully and particularly all that was done.

Answer. Stebbins, being chairman of the committee, would take the box, place it upon the table before us, take his knife and break the seal, and open the box in our presence, lay the ballots out upon the table, part at a time as required; he would sort them out, count them in twenty-fives, pass them to me; I would count them, hand them to O'Brien; he would lay the packages on the end of the table, in packages of twenty-five at a time, one package across the other, so if there was an error in the count we could easily go back of the packages and correct it. Occasionally I would find a package of twenty-four as it came from Stebbins. We were counting for member of Congress, third district, in this way, and I would hand it back to Stebbins, and he would recount it and place another ballot with it, and occasionally one with twenty-six; I would pass that to him, and one would be taken from it; then I would recount it, and pass it to O'Brien. I think in one or two instances a package would pass me, and O'Brien would detect the error. That was the modus operandi in regard to all the ballots.

The House will observe. Stebbins handles the ballots first and then passes them on. See what he says about the counting of other elections in the same room and at the same time:

Cross-interrogatory 40. When were the votes for Mr. Denny's senatorial district counted?

Answer. I should have to look at one of my boxes not here to determine. I have ascertained that they were recounted on the 11th of November.

Cross-int. 41. Was it not during the counting of the ballots for Representative to Congress from the third district?

A. It must have been, because the committee had not finished their count.

Cross-int. 42. And in the same room?

A. Yes, sir; in the same room.

Cross-int. 43. Were not the ballots for some of the wards of the fourth congressional district for Representative to Congress counted at the same time, and by whom?

A. Yes, the ballots for Representative to Congress for the fourth district, for wards 1, 2, 6, and 12, were recounted during the period occupied by the committee in counting the ballots for the third district; the ballots were counted by other parties than the committee, but under their direction.

(Witness here states that before signing he would like to state in answer to cross-interrogatories before put to him.)

I desire to state that the ballots for ward 1 in the fourth district were counted Saturday evening, November 11, by Messrs. Priest, Lee, and Clapp, and not by the committee, though in our presence, and the same is true of wards 9, 11, and 12. Ward 10 was counted by the committee. These counts were for members of the State Legislature.

Int. 13. Did your committee compare the number of votes found in the envelopes from the several wards with the number of names checked upon the check-lists or tally-sheets in those wards?

A. We did not. Wards 13, 14, 15, 16, and 17 were counted on November 10, 1876; wards 18, 19, 20, 21, and 24, November 11, 1876.

SOLO. B. STEBBINS.

The aldermanic committee say that they commenced counting on Saturday evening at two o'clock and closed the count at twelve o'clock midnight for five of the wards, which five wards added together give 10,000 votes. Now, Mr. Speaker, that is the size of the ballot, [exhibiting a ballot.] Think for a moment of three men counting 10,000 of such votes in nine hours. That is the time stated by Mr. Stebbins; and I know gentlemen on the other side will not contradict him. Is it physically possible that 10,000 of these votes could have been counted in nine hours? And Mr. Stebbins says that while they were doing this, two other committees were in the same room handling the same tickets and counting for senate and for the fourth congressional district. A pretty set of men to decide upon the rights of the people! Alderman Stebbins with his committee and two other committees handling the same ballots at the same time! Very naturally they got matters mixed; and consequently Stebbins reports some votes for Mr. Morse and some for Mr. Frost—candidates in another district. Why? Because these different committees were handling the same tickets got them intermixed.

One other point: Stebbins, to be very particular about it, says that each one handled the tickets more than once. But I say even if they handled the tickets but once, they must in those nine hours have counted 133 votes per minute, not counting the time they stopped for refreshments; for my friend from Massachusetts [Mr. HARRIS] says they do drink occasionally even in Massachusetts. Remember, they began on the five wards at two p. m. and closed at twelve. This would make ten hours; but the witnesses all agree that one hour was lost in consultation with the city attorney, thus leaving only nine hours in which to count 10,000 votes.

Was that not going on with a rush? Is it upon such a count that my friends on this side are asked to abandon their party and go with gentlemen on the other side?

Mr. Daly and Mr. Larnier both testified that they took the greatest possible pains in the ward count. A republican ward officer being examined and asked whether the ward count was correct, says: "Yes, I believed it was correct then and I believe it is correct now," notwithstanding the count of Mr. Stebbins.

I want to show who this Mr. Stebbins is. My friend from Maryland [Mr. WALSH] said yesterday that the majority of this aldermanic committee belonged to the same political party with himself. Well, sir, Stebbins, the republican member of the committee and its chairman, being asked to what political party the members of the committee belonged, says: "I am a republican, O'Brien is a democrat, and Viles is a democrat with republican tendencies." Now, I want my friend from Maryland to say to which of those parties he belongs.

Mr. Speaker, when the second count was called for, who made the motion for the appointment of the committee? I read from the minutes of the board of aldermen, November 6, 1876:

On motion of Alderman Stebbins, Mr. Stebbins, Mr. Viles, and Mr. O'Brien were appointed the committee.

Mr. Stebbins, on his own motion, was appointed chairman of the committee, and he selected the other two men to act with him! Stebbins is shown to be one of the shrewdest politicians in Boston; and, sir, let me go into the republican party and pick my men, and I may get men who will co-operate with me just as well as if they belonged to my own party.

Let us see again what Stebbins does. We read in the minutes that "after hearing of arguments of counsel, &c., Mr. Stebbins moved" this and "Mr. Stebbins moved" that. Mr. Stebbins was the committee. The other two were no doubt clever men, but comparatively ignorant, acting under the adroit and sleight-of-hand Stebbins, who could handle a ticket as a sportsman would a playing-card.

Now, how did they count the votes? Stebbins says that he took them out of the ballot-box, counted them out in twenty-fives and passed them to the other members of the committee. Stebbins was the first to handle the tickets. How easy it would have been for him while handling them to slip off some of the pasters. When he has handed over one lot of twenty-five to Viles and while Viles is counting those, what is Stebbins doing? He says that he is getting together another twenty-five; but how easy it would be for him to pull off some of those pasters without O'Brien and Viles knowing anything about it.

Mr. HISCOCK. I desire to ask the gentleman whether the fact that the vote for each candidate was increased by the aldermanic count does not prove that pasters were not removed.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. No, sir. They increased the vote of each one a little; but they took good care to increase Mr. Field 4 votes more than Mr. Dean. When men want to cheat or to do a mean thing it often appears that they came very near doing right, but missed it by only a little; just enough to effect the object. Do you tell me that Stebbins could not have slipped those pasters off when he knew he had only to make a change of 4 votes? Do you tell me that a man who comes here with this supplemental affidavit after he has given his testimony is not capable of doing so? Do you tell me that he had not the motive? No wonder the gentleman from Maine [Mr. FRYE] did not want the affidavit of Mr. Stebbins read in full, for in a long practice at the bar I never knew a case where a man undertaking a statement of this kind, even though his lawyer might write it for him or although it might be written in the city of Washington and sent to Boston for him to swear to, did not make some slip.

Here is the trip Mr. Stebbins makes. I read from his testimony. I mean his voluntary affidavit made since the argument of this case began to meet some of the weak points presented in the progress of the case. He says it was not possible for the pasters to cover both the words "for Representative in Forty-fifth Congress" and the name of the candidate, for both were printed in very large letters. Here is the ticket, twelve inches long by six wide. I hope the printer may be able to give a fac-simile of so much as refers to Congress:

For Representative to Congress,

WALBRIDGE A. FIELD.

It will be seen how difficult it was in pasting the name of Dean over Field to keep the paster from concealing "for Representative to Congress." If perchance it did, Stebbins tells us his committee counted it blank, while he and our committee give Mr. Field 25 votes cast for the fourth district, because we thought the voters meant to vote for him for the third district.

Where is Mr. Field's name? Here it is, and just above it, "For Representative to Congress;" and it is in the very smallest sized type I think except one known to the printing art. I should like to have this ticket passed over to my friend from Maryland, who made the speech yesterday, and to ask him to compare Stebbins's testimony with the fact, so he can judge for himself. Stebbins said that the words, "For Representative to Congress," were printed in the very largest type, when, as the gentleman can see from this paper, it is rather in the very smallest. That shows he was trying to make a case without having the facts before him. This was brought in not by Mr. Dean's friends but by others.

Now, I would like to pursue this matter a little farther. This same man Stebbins, who first handled all the votes, testifies it was two o'clock at night before the result was known. The evidence shows that Mr. Stebbins, this impartial officer of the law, at two o'clock in the morning, rushed breathless to the house of his friend, Mr. Field, aroused him, and informed him that he had been elected by 4 votes.

Was that the conduct of an impartial, fair-minded man after ascertaining the result to run off and wake up his friend and inform him of the result? Was it not more like the act of a partisan?

To show the utter rottenness, the utter contempt with which that second count ought to be considered, let me read further from the testimony in reference to the tally and check lists:

Interrogatory 13. Did your committee compare the number of votes found in the envelopes (ballot-boxes) from the several wards with the number of names checked upon the check-lists or tally-sheets in those wards?

Answer. We did not.

The tally-list and the check-list, where every man's name is recorded, should have been before that board to see whether there were too many or too few ballots in the box, for if there were more ballots in the box than there were names on the check-list, prima facie there was something wrong. These gentlemen seem to have utterly disregarded that important feature in the case. They were asked whether they compared the number of names on the check-list or the tally-list in these wards with the number of ballots found in the ballot-box, and they say they did not compare them.

Mr. HARRIS, of Massachusetts. Do you understand the check-list would show how many ballots had been cast for any one candidate?

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. The check-list would have shown how many ballots were cast, and if the number of ballots exceeded or fell below the check-list there was prima facie evidence of fraud or mistake somewhere.

Mr. HARRIS, of Massachusetts. The check-list would show how many voted.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. That is true; that is what I complain of, that the check-list was not compared with the number of ballots found in the boxes. When you increased the number of votes at some of the wards, there was no comparison made between the check-list and the number of votes found in the ballot-boxes. If there had been found any discrepancy, it would have been proof of fraud or mistake. There has already been reference made to the manner of counting adopted by the board of aldermen. If the sticker covered "For Representative to Congress," the vote was not counted, and it was put down as a blank. Now, what is the fact? Mr. Field brings the proceedings of the aldermanic board here and my friend from Maine complains that we use it. If he [Mr. FRYE] will hand it to me, I will show him wherein the recount made by the aldermen is discredited. I will read from the minutes of the aldermen wherein the committee are explaining how they made the recount. From which it will be seen if a vote were cast for "Mr. Dean" it was thrown out by the chairman of the committee, (Stebbins.) I read:

Alderman O'BRIEN. There were also votes for Mr. Morse, Mr. Dean, Mr. Frost, and all the candidates for Representatives in Congress in every ward in Boston. Mr. Frost received votes in almost every ward, and so did Mr. Dean and Mr. Morse, and all those votes were thrown out. But still, such things were illustrated to us to-night as an impossibility. It is not an impossibility, because it was done in our city in the last election in almost all the wards, and I presume the intention was to express a preference for Mr. Dean, or Mr. Morse, or Mr. Frost, under all circumstances. There were many cases of the kind cited by the aldermen, and which the chairman of the committee threw out.

Mr. FRYE. The gentleman leaves off when if he had continued he would have found they counted them further on separately. Let the gentleman read further.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. I will read further on:

Alderman STEBBINS. I am certain the alderman would not do me an injustice. Those votes were returned to the city clerk. I have my original minutes here, and in every instance those votes were returned to the city clerk.

Alderman O'BRIEN. I did not mean to contradict that; but I mean to say we did not count them. They were counted separately, the same as the 25 votes for Walbridge A. Field were counted. We did not add a vote to Mr. Morse's returns. They were sent to the city clerk, as for Rufus S. Frost, of Boston, and Leopold Morse, of Chelsea.

So my friend will see I was right. I did not deny they were returned—returned blank—my complaint was that votes cast for "Mr. Dean" were not counted for contestant. Then the finding of ballots for the adjoining district proves that while the other committee was counting the votes in the fourth district between Frost and Morse the tickets of the two districts became mixed, and that the latter count, therefore, was entirely unreliable; when it is remembered that a change of three votes would have changed the result.

And where are those ballots now? They have not been added to Dean's vote. How many there were God only knows. The committee do not tell us. That was on a wrong principle. Now, if that committee acted wrong then the whole case falls to the ground; and they tell you under oath they would not count a vote for Dean if it was "Mr. Dean."

Now, gentlemen, which set of counters is entitled to the more credit? Those sworn officers who had a whole day to count deliberately fifteen hundred or two thousand, as the case may be, or this committee. I want to show now how, while this committee composed of Mr. Stebbins and two men of his own choosing were counting the votes of the third district, it happens that the votes of the fourth district got into the third.

How easy it would have been, when these counters from the fourth district were counting for Morse and Frost, to take a few votes from Dean and to put a like number from the fourth district into the third district, and thus deprive Dean of his return; Mr. Stebbins and his committee acting with a carelessness which was inexcusable either in the facts or the law of the case.

All I ask of our friends is to examine the two counts and see which is entitled to the more credit. I wish to refer to the law in regard to the count made by the aldermen; and I want my friend, the gentleman from New York, [Mr. HISCOCK,] to come where he may hear what I have to say, for I know he will not contradict me. I want to bring him here to the law on that question. I promised to show that the law was not complied with in a single particular by this committee, and I am going to make that promise good. The law says that the city clerk shall forthwith enter the returns from the wards upon his records. I ask my friend did he do it? Did he comply with the law?

Mr. HISCOCK. I will answer the gentleman's question by saying this: if the filing of the records in the office is an entry of them, then he did it.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. The boxes were carried there, but never opened, so far as we know, and no entry was made upon the record as the law directs. Carrying the boxes to the clerk's office was no entry on the records. It is the failure of the clerk to make the entry which constitutes the violation of the law. Again, the law says the aldermen, if they make the count, or the committee, if they make the count, shall send the corrected returns to the clerk. Did they do it? I ask my friend the question, Did the committee after they made their count send their returns to the clerk?

Mr. HISCOCK. They corrected the returns. As I understand it, they complied literally with the act.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. To whom did they send them?

Mr. HISCOCK. They were corrected in the office.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. No, sir; my friend cannot contradict it. The law says the committee shall send their return to the clerk; and the committee in this case made their return to the aldermen, and by that return they elected Dean, as the following table will show:

	Committee's count.										Totals.
	13.	14.	15.	16.	17.	18.	19.	20.	21.	24.
Benjamin Dean.....	1,497	1,100	855	889	803	573	1,125	1,035	545	803	9,315
Walbridge A. Field.....	225	950	751	625	1,131	1,413	614	891	1,333	1,361	9,326
Walbridge A. Field, (fourth district).....						25					25
Wm. A. Field.....				1							1
Field.....							3				3
LEOPOLD MORSE.....				1							1
Rufus S. Frost.....				2		1					3
Francis M. Weld.....								1			1

At this point I will read the returns from the ward officers, in order that the House may see the difference in the two:

	Ward returns.										Totals.
	13.	14.	15.	16.	17.	18.	19.	20.	21.	24.
Benjamin Dean.....	1,495	1,076	855	896	802	579	1,126	1,038	547	805	9,306
Walbridge A. Field.....	219	939	753	621	1,131	1,410	614	897	1,331	1,361	9,326
Walbridge A. Field, (fourth district).....						25					25
A. Field.....							1				1
Samuel D. Smith.....									1		1

But as the committee reported to the aldermanic board instead of to the clerk, the former undertook to and did revise the result as given by the committee, though two out of three of the committee who made the count voted against it. This the board did in open violation of law, for if they had not counted they had no power to revise the count of the committee. Had the law, the count, and the report of the committee been observed, Mr. Dean would have had his seat. But Stebbins and his friends voted them down and had the 25 votes transferred from the fourth to the third district and had the certificate given to Mr. Field. I allege that in not one single particular did they comply with the law. Yet our friends here are asked to go against the report of their committee, disregard the popular will as ascertained through the legal channels of Massachusetts, and to continue a gentleman in his seat who holds it by the means I have described. Will they do it?

Mr. HISCOCK. I desire to ask the gentleman if this difference was not over the language used in the certificate with reference to the 25 votes?

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. Yes, sir; I stated that. I stated that the committee who counted these votes returned Mr. Dean elected by a plurality of votes. And it was not in the power of the aldermen to change it. If the aldermen made the count they can make the correction. But if the committee made the count the committee alone can make the correction. This House might have corrected the error, but the aldermen could not correct it. But they took high-handed measures and made the change and gave the seat to the gentleman who now occupies it and our friends are now called upon to sustain and sanction this outrage upon the people of Massachusetts, and refuse the seat to my friend Mr. Dean, who now sits on my right. The law, as the gentleman from New York admits, has not been complied with in a single particular; with every motive that could influence a partisan pressed upon Stebbins to make a change of an honest count made by a hundred men when they had no motive to make any other than the true returns.

If this recount was to be had and the law authorized it, then the law ought to have been followed in all its details. I allege again, and I call upon my friend and namesake from Massachusetts to correct me if I am wrong, that the law was not complied with in any single particular. That being the case, and confessedly so, from the fact that my friend from New York [Mr. HISCOCK] virtually confesses it, I leave the case with the House. If it should be their will to retain Mr. Field in the seat which he fills with so much dignity and ability, I shall feel no regrets. His conduct throughout this case has been that of a cultivated and honorable man, and if I have said anything in the heat of debate which might be construed to reflect on him, I beg to assure the House I did not so intend it; that the warmth exhibited in debate springs from no unkind feeling to him.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will now read the resolution reported by the committee.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That Walbridge A. Field is not entitled to a seat in this House as the Representative from the third congressional district of the State of Massachusetts.

Resolved, That Benjamin Dean is entitled to a seat in this House as the Representative from the third congressional district of the State of Massachusetts.

Mr. SPRINGER. I call for the yeas and nays; but first I would inquire if the minority of the committee did not report resolutions as an amendment to the resolutions of the majority, and if a vote ought not first to be taken upon them.

The SPEAKER. The Chair was not aware that the resolutions of the minority had been offered.

Mr. SPRINGER. They should first be voted upon; but I suggest that the members of the minority withdraw that amendment, and let us take one vote upon agreeing to the resolutions reported by the majority.

Mr. HISCOCK. I have no objection. I would just as soon that a vote be taken on the resolutions of the majority as upon those of the minority.

The SPEAKER. The Chair did not understand that the gentleman from New York had yet presented the amendment.

Mr. FRYE. I rise to a point of order. I supposed that the only resolution pending is the resolution declaring that Mr. Dean is entitled to his seat, and the previous question is operating upon that.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would state to the contrary: that by agreement between the parties, the resolutions offered by the minority are first to be voted on. The gentleman from New York, however, states his willingness to withdraw the amendment and allow a vote to be taken directly upon the report of the majority.

Mr. FRYE. My point of order is simply this: the previous question is in operation and suppose it should turn out that the resolutions of the majority should not be adopted, then as a matter of course the other resolution reported by the minority will be voted upon immediately after.

The SPEAKER. If the resolutions of the majority are not adopted then the Chair thinks that it would leave the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. FIELD] in his seat.

Mr. HISCOCK. To save trouble I ask that a vote be taken on the amendment; of course the yeas and nays will only be called once.

The SPEAKER. The amendment will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That Walbridge A. Field is entitled to a seat in this House as a Representative in the Forty-fifth Congress from the third district of Massachusetts.

Resolved, That Benjamin Dean is not entitled to a seat in this House as a Representative in the Forty-fifth Congress from the third congressional district of Massachusetts.

The SPEAKER. Unless there be a division called for of the amendment, the vote will be taken upon the two resolutions together.

Mr. SPRINGER. I call for the yeas and nays on the adoption of the amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 120, nays 119, not voting 52; as follows:

IN SENATE.

THURSDAY, March 28, 1878.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. BYRON SUNDERLAND, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a message from the President of the United States, transmitting, in answer to a resolution of the 14th ultimo, copies of correspondence between the governments of the United States and China respecting the Ward claims and the claim of Charles E. Hill; which was ordered to lie upon the table, and be printed.

REPORT ON FORESTRY.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following concurrent resolution from the House of Representatives; which was read:

Resolved by the House of Representatives, (the Senate concurring.) That there be printed 15,000 copies of the report upon forestry transmitted by the President to Congress from the Commissioner of Agriculture on the 13th day of December last; 15,000 copies thereof for the use of the House of Representatives, 7,500 for the use of the Senate, and 2,500 copies for the Commissioner of Agriculture: Provided, however, That the total number of pages of said report shall not exceed six hundred and fifty.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution will be referred to the Committee on Printing.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I suppose it should go to the Committee on Agriculture, as the subject has been before that committee.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. This is a mere matter of printing, and the Chair supposes that under the rule the resolution must go to the Committee on Printing.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. That is true, but the subject of forest cultivation has been before the Committee on Agriculture. It is highly probable that after the examination of the resolution by the Committee on Agriculture it would then at the request of that committee be referred to the Committee on Printing. The chairman of the Committee on Agriculture [Mr. PADDOCK] is not now in, and I have no objection to having the resolution lie on the table until he comes in, in order to see what his wishes are.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. There is a similar resolution from the House of Representatives in relation to the report of the Commissioner of Agriculture and both resolutions will lie on the table for the present.

Mr. PADDOCK. Subsequently said: I understand that there are two resolutions here from the House of Representatives, one relating to the printing of the report of the Commissioner of Agriculture and the other relating to the printing of the report of a special commission on forestry, and upon being laid before the Senate, at the suggestion to the Senator from West Virginia, that these resolutions should go of the Committee on Agriculture, they were laid on the table temporarily until I should come in, the Senator from West Virginia thinking it might be proper that they should go to the Committee on Agriculture. I understand from the chairman of the Committee on Printing that the law is that such resolutions shall be referred to the Committee on Printing, and therefore I ask their reference to that committee.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair so understands, according to the rule.

Mr. PADDOCK. I will state that the subject of forestry has been considered by the Committee on Agriculture, and reports and papers and communications in reference to that subject, as well as with reference to the subject of the report of the Commissioner of Agriculture, are before us.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution to print the report on forestry will be referred to the Committee on Printing.

AGRICULTURAL REPORT FOR 1877.

The following concurrent resolution from the House of Representatives was referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved by the House of Representatives, (the Senate concurring,) That there be printed 300,000 copies of the report of the Commissioner of Agriculture for 1877; 254,000 copies for the use of the House of Representatives, 56,000 copies for the use of the Senate, and 20,000 copies for the use of the Department of Agriculture: Provided, however, That the number of pages of said report shall not exceed five hundred.

I move the reference of this paper to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. THURMAN. I also present another memorial from the same person in reference to a claim which he had upon the Government, and asking a re-examination of it by the Committee on Claims. I ask its reference to that committee.

Mr. McMILLAN. I understand the Senator from Ohio to ask that the memorial which he presents be referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. THURMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. McMILLAN. Will the Senator state what it is?

Mr. THURMAN. It is the claim of Colonel Worthington. The case was once before the Committee on Claims and was reported adversely. He asks a reconsideration of it and the consideration of further testimony, which he submits.

Mr. McMILLAN. Very well.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The memorial will be referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. McPHERSON presented the memorial of the Microscopical Society of New Jersey, in favor of an amendment of the postal laws so as to allow the transmission through the mails of microscopical slides and objectives; which was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

He also presented the petition of the Presbyterian church and the Congregational church of Newton, New Jersey; the petition of the Presbyterian church of Stewartville, New Jersey; the petition of the Belleville Avenue Congregational church of Newark, New Jersey; and the petition of the First Reformed church of Orange, New Jersey, praying for the appointment of a commission of inquiry concerning the alcoholic liquor traffic; which were ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a resolution of the Legislature of New Jersey, in favor of the passage of a law for the ascertaining of the balance due to the subscribers to the centennial board of finance, and making an appropriation for the payment of the same from the Treasury of the United States; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 2291) for the relief of Thomas W. Collier, reported it with an amendment.

Mr. CHRISTIANCY. The Committee on the Judiciary having reported the bill to repeal the bankrupt law, I move that the committee be discharged from the further consideration of certain petitions, memorials, and remonstrances on that subject.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. TELLER, from the Committee on Railroads, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 655) to incorporate the National Pacific Railroad and Telegraph Company, reported it with amendments.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. OGLESBY asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1009) for the relief of Peter Phillips; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The motion was agreed to.

BILL RECOMMITTED.

Mr. DORSEY. I reported Senate bill No. 600 the other day from the Committee on the District of Columbia, but since that time I understand that persons desire to be heard in reference to some of its provisions, and I ask that it be recommitted.

Mr. EDMUNDS. What is the bill?

Mr. DORSEY. Senate bill No. 600.

Mr. EDMUNDS. What is it about? What is the title?

Mr. DORSEY. It is a bill in relation to certificates of assessment for special improvements in the District of Columbia. We desire it to be recommitted to the committee for the purpose of giving certain persons a right to be heard.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Very well.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion to recommit the bill.

The motion was agreed to.

PENSION BILLS.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. No. 221) granting a pension of $50 a month to Mary Kirby Smith Eaton during her widowhood.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It directs the Secretary of the Interior to place on the pension-roll the name of Mary Kirby Smith Eaton, widow of the late General Amos B. Eaton, and to pay her a pension of $50 a month, from the date of the passage of the act, during her widowhood.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Pensions, with an amendment in line 7 before the word "dollars" to strike out "fifty" and insert "thirty;" so as to read, "a pension of $30 a month."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill granting a pension to Mary Kirby Smith Eaton during her widowhood."

Mr. KIRKWOOD. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 467) restoring the name of Thomas Crawford, a soldier of the Mexican war, to the pension-roll.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It directs the Secretary of the Interior to restore to and place upon the pension-roll the name of Thomas Crawford, of Indiana, a soldier of the Mexican war, whose name was stricken from the roll upon his enlistment in the United States Army during the late war against the rebellion.

Mr. McMILLAN. Is there a report accompanying the bill?

Mr. KIRKWOOD. Yes, a written report from the House committee.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The report will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the following report, submitted by Mr. RICE, of Ohio, of the House of Representatives, December 7, 1877:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 2451) restoring the name of Thomas Crawford to the pension-roll, after a careful consideration, respectfully report:

That Thomas Crawford was regularly enrolled on the pension-roll of the United States on the 30th day of July, 1864, on account of a gunshot wound received in the line of his duty as a private in Company K, Second Regiment United States Infantry, in the Mexican war. Although his wound still disabled him, he enlisted in the late war on the 28th December, 1863, in Company B, Thirteenth Regiment Indiana Cavalry; he was accepted and mustered in, according to the testimony of Major Stout, by whom he was enlisted on account of his military knowledge and experience, but never was able for actual service. In the capacity he was enlisted for he did his whole duty well, but in long marches he was necessarily dropped out, and left in the hospitals. At the muster-out he was not with the regiment, and hence appears on the muster-out of the company as deserted, this being on the 18th November, 1865. On this account the Pension Bureau decline to restore his name to the roll; this, we think, is no sufficient ground for refusal to restore his name to the pension-roll. His desertion, if it were true, would prevent his obtaining a pension if his application was on account of injury received in the last war; but as he had a certificate by right for his services in the Mexican war, there is no provision of law that desertion, even if it existed, which is by no means admitted by the claimant in this case, should work a forfeiture of a prior right. A right to an invalid pension is as distinctly defined a legal right as a right to a farm or any personal chattel, and unless there is distinct legal ground for forfeiture there can be no forfeiture by implication; hence your committee would report back the bill and recommend its passage.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 2516) granting a pension to Fannie E. Records, widow of Albert B. Records, late a private in Company G, Fifteenth Regiment Maine Volunteers.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. COCKRELL. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. No. 931) granting a pension to James Shields.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It directs the Secretary of the Interior to place on the pension-roll the name of James Shields, late a brigadier-general of the United States Army, at the rate of $50 per month, in lieu of the pension which he now receives.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

WARREN MITCHELL.

Mr. HARRIS. I ask the indulgence of the Senate to make Senate bill No. 855 the special order for to-morrow immediately after the morning hour.

Mr. INGALLS. What bill is that?

Mr. HARRIS. It is a bill for the relief of Warren Mitchell. It involves pretty large interests and perhaps will take an hour or more to consider it. It is important that it be decided one way or the other, and I should be glad if the Senate would consent to make it a special order for to-morrow immediately after the expiration of the morning hour.

Mr. INGALLS. To displace the railroad bill?

Mr. HARRIS. I wish the Senator in charge of the railroad bill to consent that it be informally laid aside for the consideration of this measure. Of course I do not desire to displace it except in an informal way.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The rules provide for the unfinished business of the Senate, and a special order would not interfere with it.

Mr. HARRIS. As I say, I do not desire to interfere with the unfinished business except in an informal way.

Mr. THURMAN. I did not hear the proposition of the Senator from Tennessee. Will he state it again?

Mr. HARRIS. I should like simply to take up Senate bill No. 855 and make it the special order for to-morrow immediately after the expiration of the morning hour, laying aside the consideration of the Senator's bill informally.

Mr. THURMAN. What is Senate bill No. 855?

Mr. HARRIS. A bill for the relief of Warren Mitchell, of Kentucky, which will take perhaps an hour or an hour and a half to consider.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It is a claim of $120,000.

Mr. THURMAN. I will say to my friend that it will do no good to make the bill a special order. The unfinished business, of course, overrides it.

Mr. HARRIS. I understand; and I do not desire to have the bill taken up unless the Senator from Ohio will consent to let the railroad bill be passed over informally.

Mr. THURMAN. I suggest to the Senator from Tennessee that he would be very much more likely to get the bill considered if he would have it taken up in the morning hour or by waiting until all who wish to speak in any given day upon the railroad bill shall have spoken, and then get it up at the end.

Mr. HARRIS. If any Senator desires to speak on the railroad bill on Friday I am perfectly willing to make this bill the special order immediately after such argument shall have closed to-morrow, subordinating the bill to that extent to the railroad bill.

Mr. THURMAN. I am very willing to do anything to facilitate the wishes of the Senator from Tennessee, and I shall make no objection to his request; but I really do not think he would gain anything by making it a special order. If the Senate is disposed to take it up, a majority can take it up at any time, and if they are disposed not to do so they can overrule a special order at any time. If the Senator watches his opportunity, he will be just as likely to get along with the bill without having it made a special order.

Mr. HARRIS. I will make no motion, but simply give notice that to-morrow if there be no gentleman who desires to be heard upon the railroad bill I shall ask the Senate to take up for consideration the bill of which I spoke. If there is any gentleman who wishes to address the Senate upon the railroad bill, I shall ask the Senate to consider this bill at the conclusion of his remarks.

Mr. CONKLING. What is the bill the Senator wishes to take up?

Mr. HARRIS. It is a bill for the relief of Warren Mitchell, of Kentucky, that involves a pretty large interest and that I think it important should be decided one way or the other. Therefore, I shall ask the Senate to consider it to-morrow. There is a majority report and a minority report in the case, and its consideration will take an hour, or an hour and a half perhaps.

OTOE AND MISSOURIA RESERVATION.

Mr. PADDOCK. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. No. 373) to amend an act to provide for the sale of a portion of the reservation of the Confederated Otoe and Missouria and the Sac and Fox of the Missouri tribes of Indians in the States of Kansas and Nebraska.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

Mr. PADDOCK. I suggest that the Clerk read the amendment which was offered by instruction of the committee after the bill was reported. The amendment is in the nature of a substitute, and it was authorized by the committee to be reported in place of the bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The substitute will be reported at length.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to strike out all after the enacting clause of the bill and insert:

That section 3 of the act of August 15, 1876, chapter 308, entitled "An act to provide for the sale of a portion of the reservation of the Confederated Otoe and Missouria and the Sac and Fox of the Missouri tribes of Indians" be, and the same hereby is, amended so as to read as follows:

"That after the survey and appraisement of said lands the Secretary of the Interior shall be, and is hereby, authorized to offer one hundred and twenty thousand acres from the western side of the same for sale, through the United States public land office at Beatrice, Nebraska, for cash, to actual settlers, or persons who shall make oath before the register or receiver of the land office at Beatrice, Nebraska, that they intend to occupy the land for authority to purchase which they make application, and who shall within three months from the date of such application make a permanent settlement upon the same in tracts not exceeding one hundred and sixty acres to each purchaser: Provided, That if, in the judgment of the Secretary of the Interior, it shall be more advantageous to sell said lands upon deferred payments, he may, with the consent of the Indians expressed in open council, dispose of the same upon the following terms as to payments, that is to say, one-third in cash, one-third in one year, and one-third in two years from date of sale, with interest at the rate of 6 per cent. per annum: And provided further, That no portion of said land shall be sold at less than the appraised value thereof, and in no case less than $2.50 per acre: And provided further, That whenever a settler on any of the lands subject to sale under the act to which this is amendatory shall apply to purchase a tract containing a small excess over one hundred and sixty acres, owing to the legal subdivisions being made fractional by boundary line of reservation, township line, or other cause, his application shall not be rejected on account of such excess; but, if no other objection exist, the purchase shall be allowed as in other cases."

Mr. EDMUNDS. Does that amendment come from any committee, Mr. President?

Mr. PADDOCK. Yes, sir; from the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I should like to hear it explained.

Mr. PADDOCK. I will state the case. The act to which this is amendatory was passed at the first session of the Forty-fourth Congress, providing for the sale of one hundred and twenty thousand acres off the west end of the reservation of the Otoe and Missouri tribe of Indians. Section 3 requires that the lands shall be sold to actual settlers in tracts not exceeding one hundred and sixty acres. Under the ruling of the Commissioner of the General Land Office, under whose direction this land is being sold in accordance with the provisions of the act, actual settlers are construed to be those who must be upon the land when they make their application to purchase one hundred and sixty acres. This has led to infinite trouble, to many antagonisms, and to much inconvenience. It is proposed simply to amend in that respect so that parties may declare their intention, may file, so to speak, upon one hundred and sixty acres of land and have three months in which to put up their improvements and show that they are to become actual settlers. That is all there is of that.

Then there is another amendment that relates to fractional excesses over one hundred and sixty acres, which will of course be less in area than a quarter of a quarter section. This reservation was irregular in shape, and there are some fractional pieces—less, of course, necessarily than forty acres—sometimes ten acres, sometimes fifteen acres, and there is no authority or way to dispose of them, and it was thought best that authority should be given by this amendment to allow parties to take not only one hundred and sixty acres but one hundred and sixty-five or one hundred and seventy-five or whatever it may be if the land is contiguous. That is all there is in it. This amendment does not change the law in any other particular.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I notice that the act of the 15th August, 1876, for some reason or other, did not receive the approval of the President although it became a law by the expiration of ten days without its being returned.

Mr. PADDOCK. Will the Senator from Vermont allow me, before he proceeds, to read to him exactly the amendment that is proposed?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Yes.

Mr. PADDOCK. He has the law before him. After the words "actual settlers," this is inserted:

Or persons who shall make oath before the register or receiver of the land-office at Beatrice, Nebraska—

Which office is charged with the responsibility of conducting the sale—that they intend to occupy the land for authority to purchase which they make application, and who shall within three months from the date of such application make a permanent settlement upon the same, in tracts not exceeding one hundred and sixty acres.

And then the other amendment is the last clause, the additional proviso at the end of the section. I will read it:

And provided further, that whenever a settler on any of the lands subject to sale under the act to which this is amendatory shall apply to purchase a tract containing a small excess over one hundred and sixty acres, owing to the legal subdivisions being made fractional by boundary-line of reservation, township-line, or other cause, his application shall not be rejected on account of such excess; but, if no other objection exist, the purchase shall be allowed as in other cases.

Mr. EDMUNDS. What could be the "other cause," if I may ask the Senator, besides the fractional boundary line? Is the "cause" that the man wants a little more, or what?

Mr. PADDOCK. I do not know of any particular "other cause." This is the language of an experienced land officer. I simply adopted it as it came to me from him. "Other cause" might relate to other irregularities of the survey.

Mr. EDMUNDS. To begin with, then, I move to amend the amendment by striking out the words "or other cause," which might lead to what you call in the West I believe "skull-duggery" on the part of some speculator, that the Senator would not want more than any body else.

Mr. PADDOCK. It would be a very small exercise of "skull-duggery" to take a fraction connected with one hundred and sixty acres which must necessarily be less than forty acres. It could have that extent and no more; the authority given could have no further scope.

Mr. EDMUNDS. If that were true the Senator would be right, but as I read the last proviso it would hardly bear that construction:

That whenever a settler on any of the lands subject to sale under the act to which this is amendatory shall apply to purchase a tract containing a small excess over one hundred and sixty acres.

There the limitation is not "a small excess" within the fractional boundary lines, but is an indefinite small excess which may be owing to fractional boundary lines, and in that case it would be of course a small excess, but any "other cause." Therefore if you read it being in the alternative "a small excess over one hundred and sixty acres arising from any cause," then you have an indefinite expansion, as the democratic phrase used to be about the Territories of the United States. I do not think we can be too careful in respect of protecting the public lands for the benefit of actual settlers in small parcels to guard as far as we can against speculative purchasers of large quantities. I move to strike out those words "or other cause."

Mr. PADDOCK. I have no objection to the amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. OGLESBY. My attention has not been called to this bill until this very morning.

That whenever a settler on any of the lands subject to sale under the act to which this is amendatory shall apply to purchase a tract containing a small excess over one hundred and sixty acres, owing—

The "excess" is owing—to the legal subdivisions being made fractional by boundary-line of reservation, township-line, or other cause.

Made fractional by that cause. It does not apply this qualification of "other cause" except to the legal excess, made so by boundary-line of the reservation.

Mr. PADDOCK. I do not know that those words are essential. The bill was drawn by the land officers and sent to me in that form.

Mr. OGLESBY. But I do not see any trouble in this matter.

Shall apply to purchase a tract containing a small excess over one hundred and sixty acres, owing to legal subdivisions being made fractional by boundary-line of reservation, township line, or other cause.

That is, the legal subdivision is made so, which creates that excess. But the idea in the mind of the Senator from Vermont was that a man might not only get an addition to his one hundred and sixty acres because of a fractional excess, but that he might for some other cause. I think "the other cause" refers to the fractional excess and to nothing else. It was so understood by the committee.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I do not doubt it; I am not criticising the committee; I am only trying to exercise the humble privilege of one Senator in considering a measure that is proposed for my consideration; that is all; and I make these suggestions in the same interest that I know animates the heart and mind of my friend from Illinois, and that is the protection of the public lands to the actual settlers in small farms, which is the basis of success in any community as I believe.

Now "other cause" being out, to guard against the possibility that has been suggested by the Senator from Illinois, I move to insert after the word "township" the words "or section;" so as to read:

Owing to the legal subdivisions being made fractional by boundary-line of reservation, township, or section lines.

So as to cover every possible case of legal subdivisions.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I do not know but that this amendment is safe enough on the subject of the quantity of land purchased, taking it altogether as it now stands; but there is a change in the phraseology from the third section as it stands in the law to this, which looked at alone I think would be a little dangerous. The third section as it now stands is that the officer may sell—

One hundred and twenty thousand acres from the western side of the same for sale * * * for cash to actual settlers only, in tracts not exceeding one hundred and sixty acres to each purchaser.

There the limitation is on the sale of the tracts just as it ought to be and just as this amendment intends that it should be. I have no doubt as to the matter of intention, but when you read the amendment as it is proposed, you will see that the authority is—

To offer one hundred and twenty thousand acres from the western side of the same for sale, through the United States public land office at Beatrice, Nebraska, for cash to actual settlers, or persons who shall make oath before the register or receiver of the land office at Beatrice, Nebraska, that they intend to occupy the land for authority to purchase which they make application, and who shall within three months from the date of such application make a permanent settlement upon the same, in tracts not exceeding one hundred and sixty acres to each purchaser.

That going so far is plainly to my mind susceptible of the construction that a man may purchase as much as he likes provided that within three months he settles upon a tract of one hundred and sixty acres. Of course the Senator does not mean that; and taken in connection with the limitations at the bottom as to excesses, I do not think it probable that the courts of law certainly—I do not know what the Interior Department would do—would give it that construction; but I call the attention of the Senator to a possible danger that there may be in leaving the phraseology in that form.

Mr. PADDOCK. I do not see that there is any change in that respect from the original section under which the rulings have all been made.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The change is this: in the original section it is perfectly clear that the officer is to sell to actual settlers in tracts of not exceeding one hundred and sixty acres. Now by the amendment he is to sell to actual settlers one hundred and twenty thousand acres provided the purchasers of these one hundred and twenty thousand acres within three months afterward make a permanent settlement in tracts of one hundred and sixty acres each. Your limitation of one hundred and sixty acres is to the settlement upon the land and not to the purchase.

Mr. PADDOCK. I am ready to accept any amendment that the Senator desires to make in that respect, if he considers it necessary in order to guard it more carefully. I am only interested myself in securing the actual settlement of the tract of country spoken of. It happens to lie in the county in which I live, and I framed the bill with a view of getting settlers upon it and keeping off speculators.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Undoubtedly. It is entirely in a friendly spirit I make these suggestions.

Mr. PADDOCK. I accept them in that spirit.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I move to amend by inserting after the word "Nebraska," in line 13, the words:

In tracts not exceeding one hundred and sixty acres.

That then applies the sale to tracts, so that there can be no doubt about it.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. TELLER. I should like to inquire of the Senator who has the bill in charge what there is to prevent a party going on to-day and purchasing to-morrow—that is what is done to a great extent—and then have the land abandoned?

Mr. PADDOCK. I will state that under the ruling as the law now stands it is required that persons should have become trespassers upon the land, and that they should have been trespassers long enough to have built a house upon it in order to put themselves in an attitude to purchase at all. It is to relieve that embarrassment and difficulty that this amendment is proposed. It certainly cannot be obnoxious to the objection my friend raises in the particular named by him. It is an actual requirement that they shall become settlers upon the particular quarter section of land before they shall have authority to purchase. The only extension of privilege to the settler is that he may have three months to save himself from becoming a trespasser and make this settlement.

Mr. TELLER. It seems to me that before men should purchase they should be required to become settlers, and to have been settlers for some fixed period. Under this act they may settle to-day and purchase the land to-morrow.

Mr. PADDOCK. The object of the bill is to remove the necessity of those who wish to purchase becoming actual trespassers and being precluded unless they are trespassers.

Mr. TELLER. Why not amend it so that they may become settlers? Mr. KIRKWOOD. I should like to ask the Senator from Nebraska are these timber lands or prairie lands?

Mr. PADDOCK. A very small proportion of the tract is timber land. I think the timber lands are practically all disposed of.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. If that is so, I do not see the trouble in it; but if there is a large body of timber lands here, I am afraid that under this bill parties might go on and in three months strip them of their timber and leave them, not intending to make a permanent settlement at all.

Mr. PADDOCK. Quite a considerable proportion of the whole tract has already been disposed of.

Mr. KIRKWOOD. If there is no timber land, or very little, I see no trouble.

Mr. PADDOCK. I do not think there is a quarter section of timber on this tract left unsold; there is certainly very little, if any.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment reported by the Committee on Public Lands as amended.

The amendment, as amended, was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

INTERMENT OF R. F. LEHMAN.

Mr. BURNSIDE. The Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 767) authorizing the Secretary of War to allow the interment, in the national cemetery at New Berne, in the State of North Carolina, of the remains of the late R. F. Lehman, lately a commissioner of the United States circuit court in the eastern district of North Carolina, have instructed me to report it back without amendment. I would ask for immediate action on this bill. It is recommended by the committee unanimously.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PENSION BILLS.

Mr. WALLACE. I move to take up Senate bill No. 547.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (S. No. 547) granting a pension to Caroline M. Egbert was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides for placing upon the pension-roll the name of Caroline M. Egbert, widow of Medical Director Daniel Egbert, United States Navy, to take effect from the date of his death.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That ought to be explained a little. The chairman of the Committee on Pensions or my friend from Pennsylvania should explain why this pension is to be antedated.

Mr. INGALLS. If the bill contains that provision it was reported inadvertently. The Committee on Pensions in no case allow pensions except from the date of the passage of the act.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is what I understand to be the rule.

Mr. INGALLS. I move that the bill be so amended as to make the pension take effect from the passage of the act.

Mr. WALLACE. I have no objection to that.

Mr. WITHERS. It was evidently an inadvertence.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. INGALLS. As there are a few moments left of the morning hour, I desire to avail myself of the occasion to call up a few private pension bills. I move first to take up Senate bill No. 76.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (S. No. 76) granting a pension to Mary Ann McFarland was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides for placing on the pension-roll the name of Mary Ann McFarland, widow of Peter McFarland, late captain of Company C, First Kansas Infantry.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. INGALLS. I move to take up Senate bill No. 712.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (S. No. 712) granting a pension to William London was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides for placing on the pension-roll the name of William London, late a private in Company C, Second Illinois Cavalry.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. INGALLS. I move to take up Senate bill No. 687.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (S. No. 687) granting a pension to William H. Bagley, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides for placing on the pension-roll the name of William H. Bagley, late a private in Company I, Eighty-eighth Regiment Pennsylvania Volunteers.

The bill was reported to the Senate.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I should like the chairman of the Committee on Pensions briefly to state the merits of this case.

Mr. INGALLS. It is impossible for me to keep in my head the particulars of every claim that has come before the Committee on Pensions. In every case there is a written report, and if the Senator desires it to be read, of course it will be done by the order of the Senate.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I shall not call for the reading of the report.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. INGALLS. I move to take up Senate bill No. 929.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (S. No. 929) granting a pension to Hiram Howard, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to place on the pension-roll the name of Hiram Howard, late private in Company I, Second Regiment Kansas State Militia.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. INGALLS. I move to take up Senate bill No. 930.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (S. No. 930) granting a pension to Mary B. Marsh, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to place on the pension-roll the name of Mary B. Marsh, widow of W. R. Marsh, late surgeon of the Second Regiment Iowa Infantry.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. INGALLS. I move to take up House bill No. 436.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (H. R. No. 436) granting a pension to Adam Stinson, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to place upon the pension-roll the name of Adam Stinson, a private in Company I, Sixteenth Regiment of Infantry, who was enlisted to serve during the war with Mexico.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The morning hour has expired.

Mr. WITHERS. Let us have unanimous consent to pass two other pension bills.

Mr. INGALLS. There are but two more on the Calendar, and I would like to have them disposed of. I move to take up House bill No. 1948.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair hears no objection to the motion.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. No. 1948) granting a pension to Bridget T. Hopper. It proposes to place on the pension-roll the name of Bridget T. Hopper, widow of Edward C. Hopper, late a captain of Company G, of the Fifth New Jersey Volunteers.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. INGALLS. I move to take up House bill No. 142.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. No. 142) granting a pension to George McCoy. It proposes to place on the pension-roll the name of George McCoy, some time acting assistant surgeon United States Army, at Emory Hospital, Washington, District of Columbia.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

THE PACIFIC RAILROADS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. No. 15) to alter and amend the act entitled "An act to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from the Missouri River to the Pacific Ocean, and to secure to the Government the use of the same for postal, military, and other purposes," approved July 1, 1862, and also to alter and amend the act of Congress approved July 2, 1864, in amendment of said first-named act, the pending question being on the amendment submitted by Mr. MATTHEWS.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, the executive department of the United States and the officers representing the Union Pacific and Central Pacific Railroad Companies agree that the public interests as well as the prosperity, indeed the very solvency of these great corporations, demand that some action shall be taken by Congress to settle existing disputes and secure the repayment of the enormous loans made under the acts of 1862 and 1864 to aid in building the great continental railway. The President and the Secretary of the Treasury have repeatedly called the attention of Congress to the fact that the security held by the Government is not sufficient, and the accredited officers of the two companies, flushed with the success of their efforts to control legislation in the past or confiding in a supposed legal advantage, have reminded us in significant language that these great interests are exposed to the extremest danger and with apparently conscious power to impose their own terms, they have submitted a basis of settlement so exacting as to shock the moral sense of all who have considered it. In order that we may fully appreciate the danger that threatens the Government and people of the United States of losing the hundreds of millions of dollars advanced and to be advanced in building this great highway of commerce, I beg to call the attention of the Senate to an extract from a letter written by Mr. Dillon, president of the Union Pacific Railroad Company, on the 9th of February, 1875, addressed to Mr. Bristow, then Secretary of the Treasury, in which he says:

The mortgage held by the Government, in its terms and by judicial decision of the United States circuit court, cannot be enforced until the maturity of the bonds, which is near the close of the present century.

The bonds are accumulating an interest-account, also uncollectible until the principal is due. Principal and interest, when due, will amount to the very large aggregate of over $77,000,000—

And he is writing about the Union Pacific Railway indebtedness alone—

though the actual amount advanced by the Government was only $27,236,512.

For this very large amount the Government has only a second mortgage, and if it be allowed to accumulate, without any provision being made to meet it, the company will probably be utterly unable to pay it.

At the same time, it is equally manifest that the Government will be unable to collect it, except upon the assumption that it will advance the money to discharge prior mortgages, and run the road on Government account—a policy which wise statesmanship could not advise.

By standing still, therefore, the company has a load of debt accumulating for which no provision is made, and the Government is drifting farther and farther from the opportunity to secure a just return for its advances. To do nothing is to injure both the Government and the company, perhaps irretrievably to both.

In this dilemma, I venture to make a proposition, which offers, on the part of the company, all it can possibly do, and secures to the Government a substantial return for its advances.

This intimation of probable insolvency of the Union Pacific Railroad Company, and consequent loss to the Government, is repeated in a communication addressed to the Senate Judiciary Committee on the Judiciary on the 12th of November, 1877, by Mr. Dillon, and Mr. Huntington, the vice-president of the Central Pacific Railway, who joined with him in saying as to both companies what I will ask the indulgence of the Senate to listen to:

Nearly three years since the officers of the Union Pacific and Central Pacific Railroad Companies called the attention of the Secretary of the Treasury to the fact that contrary to the general expectation at the inception of the enterprise—

And I ask attention to this phraseology—

a balance of accounts in his ledger was accumulating against them which, unless some remedial legislation was soon had, would amount, by the time it became due and payable, to a sum which it might be embarrassing to the companies to pay simultaneously with their first-mortgage debt, and greater than the value of the subordinated lien of the Government on the properties themselves.

But as if this deliberate declaration was not sufficient to warn the Senate of the danger that threatens, Mr. Huntington, who appeared before the Judiciary Committee, takes occasion to say in an address delivered to that committee:

By the time—

Speaking of the Government debt and the first-mortgage debt, equal in amount to the principal of the Government bonds issued to these railroad companies—

By the time both mature and become payable it is not at all likely the property will be worth their aggregate sum, and if the shrinking and settling of prices should continue further it may happen that it will not suffice to pay more than the first mortgages.

These carefully considered statements are accompanied by equally well-considered declarations to the effect that by the terms of the acts of 1862 and 1864 the officers of the two companies have the moral as well as the legal right to distribute the earnings of the two roads to the stockholders, and although this course will certainly lead to the insolvency of the corporations, as they agree, they very plainly threaten that unless the Government will yield to their terms they will manage affairs solely with regard to the interests of the corporations and without regard to the just claims of creditors.

In order to give greater force to these extraordinary claims they have submitted to the Senate of the United States and also to its Committee on the Judiciary a proposal for a settlement in the shape of a bill by which each of the companies offers to reconvey to the Government six million acres of land derived from the Government bounty for the sum of $1.25 per acre, payable immediately, and making in all $15,000,000. This money is to be carried into a sinking fund and the interest to be compounded at 6 per cent. semi-annually until the 1st of October, 1905. They propose that to the credit of the sinking fund shall be carried any sum now due to them from the Government, and if the amount shall not equal $1,000,000 to each company it shall be made equal to that sum. They propose further that each company, in proportion to its deficiency, shall pay into the Treasury, to the credit of this fund, on the first days of April and October in each year, commencing the 1st of April, 1878, and ending the 1st of October, 1905, such sum of money as shall be ascertained by the Secretary of the Treasury to be sufficient, with the interest thereon compounded semi-annually, when added to the other sums to the credit of the sinking fund, to pay off and extinguish the bonds with 6 per cent. interest thereon from their respective dates to the 1st of October, 1905.

That we may properly understand the nature of this offer, and the advantage to the corporations and loss to the Government to follow its acceptance, it becomes necessary briefly to refer to the contract between the parties embodied in the acts of 1862 and 1864.

By the terms of this contract the Government loaned to these companies its bonds to the amount of $55,000,000, payable thirty years after date, and bearing interest at the rate of 6 per cent. per annum. These bonds were declared to be a mortgage lien on all their property, but the lien was made subordinate to another lien of $55,000,000 bonds issued by the companies themselves. On their part the corporations agreed that they would pay annually into the Treasury 5 per cent. of their net earnings, and that the Government should retain one-half the sums due from it from year to year for services rendered, and that those sums when received should be applied to the extinguishment of the debt. They further agreed to pay the principal of the bonds at maturity and all interest thereon, less the sum of 5 per cent. net earnings and one-half the sums retained for services to the Government as aforesaid.

It is agreed on all sides that some of these bonds will become due before and others after the 1st day of January, 1898, but that the mean time of payment will be on that day, and it is shown by the Judiciary Committee report that 5 per cent. of the net earnings of the two roads and one-half the service rendered the Government in the last two years have averaged the sum of $1,166,000 per annum. Nor is there any reasonable ground upon which to base a belief that the sum will be less in the future. Now, a very simple calculation will show that the $15,000,000 demanded as the price of the twelve million acres of land and to be carried to the sinking fund, placed at interest at 6 per cent. per annum, with annual rests as they require, will swell by the 1st of October, 1905, to a sum exceeding $75,000,000, and the interest on the sum of $1,166,000 per annum, being the 5 per cent. of net profits and one-half the transportation account of the Government, will by the same time equal the sum of $48,000,000, these two sums aggregating more than $100,000,000.

But not content with these enormous gains the railroad companies demand that the time of payment of the debt shall be extended from the 1st of January, 1898, to the 1st of October, 1905, a period of seven years and nine months, and their bill directs that they shall pay simply interest only on the bonds of the United States from their respective dates of maturity to the day of settlement. The Supreme Court of the United States has decided that when these bonds shall become due the principal and interest become a debt against the corporations which they are bound in law as well as in morals then to pay. The principal and interest on the 1st of January, 1898, after deducting the payments heretofore made, will amount to the sum of $142,000,000; but according to the terms of the bill, although the principal will bear interest, $86,000,000 of interest which at that time will also be a debt and should bear interest will be barren seven years and nine months although all payments to the fund made by the corporations will be at compound interest for that length of time. The loss to the Government on this score will amount to a sum exceeding $49,000,000.

Now, let us for a moment go back and see what sacrifices these gentlemen who in their addresses to the Senate Judiciary Committee say the real question is a business one and that they speak from a business stand-point demand as a condition of settlement. They require the Government to pay $15,000,000 for twelve million acres of land, a gift from the Government, and that this sum shall be placed at interest while they pay none until it shall swell to the sum of $75,000,000. Next, they demand that their annual payments of $1,166,000 shall be placed at interest, and that compounded, until the interest shall reach $48,000,000. But, not satisfied with these exactions, they demand that for seven years and nine months the Government shall receive no interest on $86,000,000, making a further loss of $49,000,000, or a total of $172,000,000—exceeding the entire debt, principal and interest, that will be due from them to the Government at that time.

And this, Mr. President and Senators, is the "business proposition" which they have submitted to the Senate of the United States, the most august deliberative assembly upon earth. The extravagant claims of these gentlemen have met with no encouragement here; but, in view of the apprehension of loss to the Government and to provide methods of securing payment of the constantly increasing debt, two measures have been presented. One of these measures is the bill under consideration, presented by the Judiciary Committee, and the other is the bill presented by the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. MATTHEWS,] from the Railroad Committee. The two measures differ not only in methods but also in the fundamental principles upon which they are based.

The bill presented by the Judiciary Committee asserts the right and power of Congress to regulate the business of these corporations created by it and to compel them to render obedience to law. The bill presented by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. MATTHEWS] assumes that Congress by contract has yielded its powers of legislation and that any settlement must rest upon a consent of the parties. If the bill presented by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. MATTHEWS] will secure to the Government the sum of money to become due and shall be accepted by the corporations, the question whether we shall adopt the one bill or the other is of little importance.

Let us, then, examine the particulars of the two bills and ascertain in what essential points they differ. The acts of 1862 and 1864 granted a charter of incorporation to the stockholders of the Union Pacific Railroad Company and, recognizing the Central Pacific Company, a corporation chartered by the Legislature of the State of California, authorized the two companies to construct a railroad from the one hundredth meridian west of Greenwich to the Sacramento River, and, as we have seen, donated a large body of land and loaned its bonds to them for more than $50,000,000. We have seen that these bonds, with the interest thereon, were declared to be a lien on the property of the companies, but subordinated to another lien of equal amount. The two companies have made enormous earnings; they have paid large dividends to the stockholders; but, notwithstanding their debt to the Government is constantly increasing and by the time the bonds shall mature will equal $118,000,000 or $120,000,000 after deducting all payments made or hereafter to be made under the existing contract, they refuse to create a sinking fund to meet this obligation and their officers openly confess the belief that this course will end in bankruptcy.

Now, the bill reported by the Railroad Committee directs that each of these companies shall pay into the Treasury the sum of $1,000,000 annually, and these sums, together with $1,000,000 claimed to have been improperly retained from each, shall constitute a sinking fund, and be placed at interest with semi-annual rests until the 18th day of October, 1900, when the accumulated sum shall be deducted from the sum of the principal of the bonds with interest to the same time, and the remainder thus ascertained to be due shall be divided into fifty payments, one of which with interest thereon shall be paid each half year until the debt shall be extinguished.

It is to be noted, first, that the companies are released from the payment of 5 per cent. of net profits and one-half the transportation account; second, that the time of payment is extended from the 1st of January, 1898, to the 1st of October, 1900, or a period of two years and nine months; and, third, that the Government is required to account for interest on the $1,000,000 claimed now to be due. By the first change the Government, instead of receiving the 5 per cent. net earnings and one-half the transportation account, in payment of so much of the debt, receives a smaller sum and is required to pay it into the sinking fund, where it is put at interest compounded semi-annually.

The Judiciary Committee estimates that this payment should be $1,166,000 per year, and the interest on this sum calculated with annual (not semi-annual) rests until the year 1900 will be more than $30,000,000.

The interest that will have been paid on the 1st of January, 1898, by the Government in excess of all repayments by the corporations will not be less than $86,900,000, and according to the principles settled by the Supreme Court of the United States in the case in 1 Otto will bear interest from that day.

This interest for two years and nine months, for which time the payment is postponed, by the provisions of the Railroad Committee bill, will be $15,180,000, which added to the $30,000,000 above, makes a total exceeding $45,000,000 to be relinquished by the Government.

But assuming that the Judiciary Committee is mistaken and has estimated the payment too high, and that it should be one million per annum instead of $1,166,000, the gift to these companies would still amount to a sum exceeding $41,000,000.

The Government has already been too bountiful in its favors to these corporations, and it can afford to make no other such gifts to them as have been made in the past. I take it that surely the representatives of the people of the United States, those who are here acting to-day as their trustees, charged with the disbursement of moneys taken from their earnings and with the duty of preserving and protecting their rights and interests, are not prepared, in view of the present condition of these corporations, of their enormous wealth present and prospective, of the fact that they are able to declare and have for two years each declared dividends and paid to their corporators from 8 to 10 per cent. per annum upon the nominal amount of stock, a fictitious stock as I believe and as is believed by the country—surely then, I say, here representing the people, the Senate is not prepared to enact this bill into a law.

Then the only question remaining is, shall Congress adopt the Judiciary Committee bill? It proposes to compel each of these corporations to pay into a sinking fund a sum which, including the 5 per cent. of net earnings and one-half the transportation account, will be $2,000,000 for each year, but the payments to be made in all shall not exceed 25 per cent. of their net earnings. The committee proposes this legislation for the reason that the two companies, after paying the operating expenses and all interest on their bonded debt, have a net income exceeding $13,000,000 per annum and have been paying dividends of 8, 9, and 10 per cent. upon a stock account which it is believed does not represent capital actually paid down. With enormous incomes, they refuse to make any provision for the payment of the Government bonds when they shall become due. At that time the mortgage debt of the two companies and having a prior lien will be $55,087,000; the Government debt, principal $55,000,000, and the interest, if no part of the 5 per cent. or one-half transportation account shall be paid, will amount to $85,000,000 more, making a total of $197,000,000, which at 6 per cent. interest will require payments each year to the amount of $11,824,000. The directors themselves say the revenues of the companies will not be sufficient to pay these sums and the stock will be entirely lost. As a consequence the mortgage will have to be foreclosed, the property sold and passed from these corporations to strangers, not in privity with the Government nor intrusted with the great work and duty of managing and controlling this important highway, to which the country has attached in the past, attaches to-day, and will in the future attach so much importance.

It is objected, however, that Congress has not the right to enact the Judiciary Committee bill; that it is powerless to defeat the meditated fraud, and must quietly permit its complete consummation. It is said by some that by the provisions of this bill an attempt is made to make a new contract between the Government and the corporations. They affirm that by the terms of the acts of 1862 and 1864 the debt of the Government will not become due until 1898, and that the bill in substance and effect makes it payable to-day. Others maintain that by the terms of these acts or by implication of law the corporations have a right to distribute the earnings of the road without regard to the claims of creditors; that this is a vested right which cannot be taken from them by Congress, either in virtue of its powers as a legislative body or by force of the reservation of authority "to alter, amend, or repeal" the acts.

If these affirmations be true I will agree that there is no power in Congress, there is no power anywhere that will authorize or justify or excuse the legislation that is proposed. But what does this bill propose to do? I do not see anywhere, in any clause, a change in the terms of the contract. I find only that, warned by the declaration that the officers of the companies have made of the danger, indeed of the almost certain insolvency to follow the unwise course of distributing from year to year all the earnings of the companies, Congress simply requires not that they shall pay any part of the debt, but shall establish a sinking fund, into which a part of the earnings shall go. The distinction between the payment of a debt or a portion of a debt and establishing a sinking fund to provide for its future payment is not a mere verbal distinction. It has been recognized by every government and by every people. In requiring this, Congress only requires these corporations to do that which our own Government is doing to-day; only that which every corporation, largely in debt, whose affairs are managed with any prudence and skill, has adopted, not alone with a view to save it from insolvency but to strengthen its credit and increase its usefulness. The Treasury of the United States has been selected as the place of deposit simply because it secures perfect security. The Treasurer of the United States has been designated as the person to manage the fund because of his relation to the Department.

The Judiciary bill does not change the terms of the contract, and the only question, as it seems to me, that is presented for our consideration is whether Congress, having created one of these corporations and granted to the other the right to certain franchises to be used within the Territories of the United States, has the power to legislate for and control them in the use of these franchises and prescribe rules and regulations for their government to the same extent that the Legislature of a State possesses over corporations of its creation or the people subject to its jurisdiction.

It cannot be said that Congress has by contract relinquished its right to exercise its original and inherent power to legislate upon any matter connected with these corporations. The acts of 1862 and 1864 have been subjected to the most searching examination, and have been analyzed in all their parts, section by section and clause by clause; yet no person has been able to find, either in their spirit and meaning as a whole or in any of their separate parts, aught that indicates even by implication a purpose to yield the sovereign power to regulate, govern, and in all things control their affairs; but to the contrary, and as if to guard against the very pretension made here to-day, we do find an express reservation of power to Congress, at any time and in its discretion, to "alter, amend, or repeal" the acts in question. The force of these words and their effect have been discussed by other Senators and will again be referred to by those who will follow me in this debate, and I will not detain the Senate with an argument to prove that the reserved power is sufficient without more to authorize the legislation proposed. And yet I would not be true to my own convictions if I were not to say that the power to "repeal" these acts, and, by consequence of their repeal, to strip these corporations of all their franchises, and then compel the marshaling of all their property and assets and the payment of all their debts, is too clear for argument. And it is equally clear to my mind that the power to "alter and amend" does necessarily refer to the exercise of the franchises and privileges granted, and confers upon Congress the right, in its discretion, to interpose, and, as settled in the case of Miller vs. The State, 15 Wallace, 498, give directions "that will carry into effect the original purpose of the grant or secure the due administration of its (the corporation's) affairs, so as to protect the rights of the stockholders and of creditors and the proper disposition of its assets."

Now, for what purpose were these corporations created and clothed with the important franchises enumerated in the acts in question? Why did Congress with such lavish bounty bestow lands greater in extent than principalities and advance its credit upon terms without precedent in the history of this or any other Government? The answer is given in the act of 1864. In was done "for the purpose of aiding in the construction of said railroad and telegraph line and to secure the safe and speedy transportation of the mails, troops, munitions of war, and public stores thereon." This was the view that dominated the minds of the Representatives and Senators at that time. The building of the road was regarded as a necessary work. The necessity of keeping the road at all times in condition to serve the Government is recognized in every part of the act. The grants were made "on condition that the corporations would pay the bonds at maturity and keep said railroad and telegraph lines in repair and use, and at all times transmit dispatches over said telegraph line and transport mails, troops, and munitions of war supplies and public stores for the Government whenever required to do so by any Department thereof." This was a great national work, of the highest importance to the sovereign power, promoted by it upon political and public grounds. Government was at that time engaged in war with the confederacy; the commerce of the country on the ocean and open seas was threatened by confederate cruisers; almost every coaling station reaching in the direction of the Isthmus of Panama was under the control of a foreign power then regarded as unfriendly to the United States. Apprehensions were felt that the great distances separating the States on the Pacific slope from the Eastern States, coupled with the difficulty, delays, and uncertainty of communication, might bring about another division of States. Inspired by these considerations and impelled by a sense of public duty, and not for the purpose of aiding a mere commercial enterprise, Congress inaugurated the great work. I cannot so well express the motives that controlled its action as it has been done by the Supreme Court of the United States:

Many of the provisions in the original act of 1862 are outside of the usual course of legislative action concerning grants to railroads, and cannot be properly construed without reference to the circumstances which existed when it was passed. The war of the rebellion was in progress, and owing to complications with England the country had become alarmed for the safety of our Pacific possessions. The loss of them was feared in case those complications should result in an open rupture; but, even if this fear were groundless, it was quite apparent that we were unable to furnish that degree of protection to the people occupying them which every government owes to its citizens. It is true the threatened danger was happily averted; but wisdom pointed out the necessity of making suitable provision for the future. This could be done in no better way than by the construction of a railroad across the continent. Such a road would bind together the widely separated parts of our common country and furnish a cheap and expeditious mode for the transportation of troops and supplies. If it did nothing more than afford the required protection to the Pacific States, it was felt that the Government, in the performance of an imperative duty, could not justly withhold the aid necessary to build it.—The United States vs. The Union Pacific Railroad Company, 1 Otto, 79, 80.

This was a great national enterprise. It was one that was worthy of the great Government of the United States. It was a work necessary to be done. It is a work necessary to be preserved. The Government of the United States has made a contract with these corporations by which they have agreed, and, so far as the idea of personality can attach to corporations, by which they have personally agreed, that they will maintain and keep this road in order and sufficient at all times to render distinct services to the United States that are pointed out in the charter of their existence.

This railroad is a great agency and the corporations are agents of Government. They occupy that relation to the Government, not because they are subjects, but because of the contract they made. It has become, then, the high and solemn duty, it is upon their part a great public trust, one which they cannot neglect without a violation of their most solemn agreement and obligation, at all times to keep themselves in a condition that will enable them to render to the Government the services which they have contracted to render, and to protect, preserve, and keep for the use of the people of the United States this great highway which the Government has made such great sacrifices to build. I say that here is sufficient grounds for the exercise of the power that Congress now claims in regard to these corporations. Here is a sufficient authority to justify, indeed to demand of the Congress of the United States that this bill shall be enacted into a law. I have heard the contrary opinion expressed by no Senator, and I would yield my own opinion to the larger experience, the greater learning, and the greater ability of the eminent lawyers who sit with me in this Chamber, but I believe that the distinct purpose, openly avowed to the officers of the United States, and the committees of this body, by the management of these corporations, to reduce them to a state of insolvency, and thus render the corporations incapable of keeping their solemn engagements and performing the great public trust they assumed, would authorize the courts of the United States to entertain a bill quia timet to prevent the threatened violation of trust; but, however that may be, Congress has now the right and power, and it has become a duty by law, to guard against the danger, and it may order into a sinking fund a sufficient amount of their annual earnings to secure the payment of the principle and interest of the debt these companies owe the Government.

Mr. HILL. May I ask the Senator a question? If there has been a violation of the trust, and that violation gives us a right to go to the courts—and I concur with the Senator that that is the case—is it not better that we should go to the courts? Why make a case here and turn that over to the courts? Why not turn the case we have got over to the courts, if that is a good case, rather than attempt to make another case and turn that over to the courts?

Mr. BAILEY. I have expressed my opinion; I may be in error—
Mr. HILL. I say to the Senator that I concur with him fully that if there is a violation of the trust and danger of an annihilation of the road, the remedy is ample before the courts. I agree that remedy would extend to taking the road out of the hands of the corporation. I think the Senator is right in that, that if a violation of the trust exists, or such a condition of things as amounts to a violation of the trust, you have a right to go to the courts.

Mr. BAILEY. I understand the Senator, then, to agree with me that, if I have correctly stated the facts, my conclusion in regard to the rights of these parties on the one hand and their obligation on the other are correct, and that the Government of the United States has the right to-day to appeal to its courts for the purpose of protecting its interests and compelling the performance of this trust?

Mr. HILL. I have said this, that if the Senator is right in his statement that the action of these parties amounts to a violation of the trust, the United States has ample remedy in the courts of justice.

Mr. BAILEY. Then certainly the Senator and I will not differ very widely; for, if we are agreed about that, certainly as doubt exists in so many minds, and instructed as both of us have been by our experience as lawyers in construing statutes and in devising remedies, he will join with me in improving the law, and make the remedy more perfect.

Now, Mr. President, I agree with very much that was said yesterday by the Senator from Georgia in the very able speech to which we all listened with so much pleasure. These acts of 1862 and 1864 are naturally divisible into two parts: First, those portions of the acts which create one corporation and give within the Territories of the United States franchises to the other, which give to both their rights, their privileges, their immunities, their powers. Another division is that portion which proposes after the corporations are created to make a contract with them. I agree with the Senator that a corporation can be created and franchises granted only by the sovereign, and that in contracting with the creatures it has called into being for a loan of money or bonds the sovereign occupies no higher position and has no rights other than will be awarded to a citizen. I agree with him further that the reserved right to alter, amend, or repeal these acts does not necessarily give to Congress the power at all times and without regard to change of circumstances to change the contract made under the second division to which I have referred.

It seems to me that when this law was enacted the corporations had a right to organize their companies but were under no obligation to accept the bounty of the Government. The two propositions were essentially distinct. Organized, they might have undertaken with their own capital or capital borrowed elsewhere to build this great line of railway, but the proposition having been submitted to them by the Government of the United States for a loan of $55,000,000 of bonds they could accept it or not as they might deem expedient or in accordance with their interests. If accepted, I agree with the Senator from Ohio [Mr. THURMAN] that Congress could the next day have withdrawn the proposition or at any time before the work was begun upon the line of railway; but whenever a single section of the work was completed and the bonds were delivered that were due from the Government upon that section, to that extent there was an executed contract between the two parties and that contract, and the obligations and rights of the parties in respect to it rested secure under the sanction of the good faith of the Government and the intelligence and civilization of the age. I say nothing about the power of Congress in the absence of a constitutional inhibition. That question is not before us; but without regard to that, this contract rested under the sanction and protection of a wise policy, of a just policy, and is, as it seems to me, (I say it respectfully to those who differ from me,) under the protection of the consciences of the people of the United States. I do not think the contract could be disturbed, but as to the remainder of the work not yet done the offer might have been withdrawn, and not until the work was finished was the contract executed in all its parts upon the part of the corporations or beyond the control as to the unfinished parts of Congress. When finished the rights of the corporations and of the Government of the United States became fixed and established; neither could disturb it. Nor, in my opinion, does the power that is reserved to alter, amend, or repeal the act give the power to Congress to interpolate a new term into the contract which had been executed. A contract is an agreement between two or more persons in regard to some particular thing. The very definition implies that there shall be a consenting of minds, that there shall be an agreeing of minds, that there shall be two parties at least to the agreement. But in the estimation of the Senator from Georgia [Mr. HILL] this bill proposes to interpolate a new term into the contract. If I believed this to be so I would vote against the bill. I would vote against it because I do not believe that Congress has the power, acting for the Government and people of the United States and against the will of a person who has contracted with it, under such a reservation as this, to make a new term in the contract. But this view interposes no obstacle to my hearty support of the bill which has been presented by the Judiciary Committee. I hold that the power of Congress in respect to matters that are properly subject to its legislative control is commensurate with the wants and the interests of the people of the United States. I hold that within its constitutional limit the Congress has the same power that a Legislature has to change the law from time to time in order to meet the varying wants and exigencies that may be developed in society.

These corporations, resting in fancied security under the protection of the law, which, as it now stands, gives to them power to distribute all their earnings to stockholders and to disregard the just claims of creditors, assert that they have a vested right in the law as it is, and that no change can be made that will interfere with their power to distribute the earnings so unwisely and so unjustly.

It is generally understood among statesmen and lawyers and laymen that the legislature may, from time to time, change the law to meet the necessities of each generation and of each state of society. The Legislature of Massachusetts or of Tennessee, looking to surrounding circumstances and conditions, will amend their laws to suit the wants of their own people. We are an English-speaking race, and of course a practical race. Our laws are practical in effect, and are made from day to day and from year to year to meet the exigencies that arise in the actual experience of our people. As a practical people we have established governments whose power reaches to every relation. It interposes in our domestic life and enters into the very privacy of our homes; it regulates the relations of husband and wife, of father and child, of neighbor and neighbor; it prescribes the laws of marriage and divorce; it directs the disposition of our estates after death, regulates the terms and conditions on which wills may be made, and points out the legal successors to lands and houses and goods; it controls the business affairs of men and makes laws for their government; it commands their services in peace and in war, and compels service in offices of public trust or in deadly battle.

There is no limit to this power other than that imposed by the people themselves by constitutional barriers. And yet it is said here to-day that great and all-reaching as is this power, however potent to regulate the most delicate and important relations of life or to interfere with the business affairs of mankind, however absolutely it may control our property or command the services of the citizen, it is robbed of all its greatness in the presence of a creation of its own and cannot forbid it to consummate a meditated wrong.

I cannot bring myself to believe that these corporations have any other or greater privileges and immunities than belong to citizens of the United States, unless they have been conferred by the Government; and where in their charters is to be found any warrant that the Government will not undertake to regulate and control their business affairs as it regulates and controls the affairs of the citizen? In my State and the State that is represented by the honorable Senator from Georgia we have a law providing that, if a debtor in anticipation of the time of payment of a debt is making a fraudulent conveyance of his property with a view to evade the payment of that debt, the creditor may sue out an attachment and impound the property and hold it under the jurisdiction of the courts until the debt shall become due. This is statutory law; but has anybody ever questioned the power of the Legislature to enact such?

Mr. HILL. I will say to my friend that, so far from questioning it, I concede it fully. I admit it is the law now that if these companies, or either of them, shall attempt to make a fraudulent conveyance of this property, or shall by their own act impair the value of this property, or shall in any way by their own act seek to destroy the security of the United States upon this property, you have an ample right to go into court and restrain them, and a perfect right to take the property out of their possession to that extent.

Mr. BAILEY. I suppose, then, the Senator from Georgia would rest the power of Congress to legislate on this subject upon the fact that there was or was not a fraud in the conduct of these parties?

Mr. HILL. I rest it upon the fact that there was or was not a breach of the trust. I do not rest the power of Congress to legislate; I rest the power of the courts to interfere; and I say your remedy is ample. I say Congress can provide remedies that the courts must administer.

Mr. BAILEY. This debt is not due—

Mr. HILL. Whether these companies have been guilty of fraud or guilty of a breach of trust is a judicial question.

Mr. BAILEY. That is not now the subject of inquiry. I am speaking now of the power of Congress as a legislative body to prescribe laws to control the conduct and business affairs of those who are subject to its power as a legislative body. I illustrated the idea that I was attempting to advance by referring to a species of legislation that is very familiar in the gentleman's State and in my own. He contends that Congress has no power to enact into a law the bill that is presented by the Judiciary Committee, and what does that do? It simply undertakes to regulate and control the action of a person who is subject to the legislative will of Congress, and not more so nor less so than the citizen of Georgia who undertakes to make a fraudulent conveyance of his property. The gentleman spoke yesterday of default, and I suppose the idea is in his mind to-day that there can be no action without a default. The citizen of Georgia who is or will become indebted in the future is not in default, although he actually conveys his property, until the debt actually becomes due.

Mr. HILL. I do not agree with the Senator. There may be several kinds of default. There may be a default in payment, which can only occur after the debt becomes due; but that is a worse default which by fraud seeks to destroy the debt before it becomes due. In the first place, where the default is one of payment and occurs after the debt becomes due, the remedy is in a court of law. If it occurs by fraud in advance of the debt becoming due and endangers the existence of the debt, then the remedy is in a court of equity.

Mr. BAILEY. The test of it then is the danger of losing the debt, as I understand.

Mr. HILL. If that danger is caused by the act of the party. If that danger is the mere result of the natural course of events, a natural depreciation of property, there is no remedy, for no debtor is responsible for the act of God or the king's enemies or the natural course of events. The debtor is responsible for his own act, and if by his own act he brings the property into disrepute, destroying the value of the property, or wasting the property, or seeking to make a fraudulent conveyance of the property, then a court of equity will intervene and restrain him. But the simple fact that the debt is not due, the simple fact that the property is insufficient to pay the debt, the simple fact that the debtor is insolvent, are all misfortunes; they are not crimes; they are not frauds.

Mr. BAILEY. Or, the gentleman should have added, if he is dividing out his estate, or if a corporation is dividing out its assets among its stockholders without regard to its obligations to pay its debts, then there is a default.

Mr. HILL. I concede that if the stockholders are dividing out that which is included in the mortgage, that which is covered by the lien, it is a fraud.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, the rights of creditors do not rest upon any idea of forfeiture of a mortgage. In the case supposed, provided for by the law of Georgia, there is no mortgage, but the Legislature interposes. Why does it interpose? The debtor is not under a legal obligation to pay the debt eo instanti, at that moment. No more is this corporation under any obligation, moral or legal, to pay to-day its prospective debt to the United States Government; but the debt is imperiled by reason of the action or conduct of the debtor, and the Legislature interposes and the legislative power changes the law and gives the creditor a new remedy. For what purpose? To protect the creditor, to compel the performance of the contract, to require the debtor to remain or to suffer his property to remain in a condition where it will be subjected to the payment of the debt; and when the gentleman concedes that that sort of legislation is constitutional and valid and right, he concedes all that we contend for here.

Mr. BECK. Will the Senator from Tennessee permit me to say that the legislation is applied to debts that existed before that legislation was had, and as to which there was no such right of interference, just as well as to those debts which were incurred afterward?

Mr. HILL. And I will say to the Senator from Tennessee further that all the legislation to which he refers in his State and mine does not interfere with the contract; it does not require the debtor to pay one cent before the debt becomes due. It simply says the property shall be held; that the debtor shall not fraudulently convey it; that he shall hold it in statu quo until the debt becomes due.

Mr. BAILEY. We propose nothing more than that here. There is no change of this contract at all. I say that it is impossible for the Senator from Georgia, with all his ingenuity, with all his ability, with all his mastery of the principles as well as of the technics of the law, to show in what particular or that in any particular this bill in requiring the creation of a sinking fund changes the contract between these parties or expedites one day the payment of the debt that will become due in the future from these corporations to the Government of the United States.

Mr. HILL. The contract requires the corporations to pay one-half of the compensation for Government transportation. This bill requires them to expend the whole of it on the debt.

Mr. BAILEY. Not at all.

Mr. HILL. You require them to pay it into a sinking fund, which sinking fund is placed in the Treasury of the creditor. You take the money away from the debtor. The law to which the Senator refers in Tennessee and Georgia does not take a dollar from the debtor before the debt is due.

Mr. BAILEY. It takes his property from him.

Mr. HILL. It does not take his property from him; it only holds it.

Mr. BAILEY. What difference does it make whether this sinking fund is in the Treasury of the United States or in a bank in New York? The Treasury is adopted for that purpose, not alone because it is a Government agency, but because it is supposed to be the safest to all parties. If a dollar shall be lost by reason of the defalcation of officers of the United States, the Government will, not in law but in honor, be bound to make that loss good. For that reason, because it is safer and more convenient, the Treasury of the United States is selected as the custodian of this fund.

Mr. HILL. How does it lessen the burdens you impose by this bill upon the debtor to pay this additional half of the transportation account simply because the creditor takes the money and holds it but does not pay it out to the creditor until the debt becomes due?

Mr. BAILEY. It is no burden to a man to pay a debt.

Mr. HILL. It is a burden to pay a debt before it becomes due.

Mr. BAILEY. The whole argument proceeds upon the assumption that a creditor has no rights in respect to the earnings of his debtor, upon the assumption that the debtor if he can under some legal technicality escape the payment of a debt may legally and properly do so. We take nothing from this company that it is not under the highest moral obligation to devote to the payment of the debt, and we simply propose to convert that moral obligation into a legal obligation. The case is not in one particular different, in the view in which I am now considering this subject, from the case that was supposed a while ago of a debtor in the State of Georgia who proposed to transfer, or attempted to transfer, his property for the purpose of avoiding the payment of a debt. The Government, or rather the law, seizes the property in that case—the law enacted by the Legislature, that undertakes to regulate and control the relations of man with his fellow-man in their business transactions. The law seizes it and dedicates it to the payment of a debt, or rather, it impounds it and holds it until the debt shall become due. His property is taken from him just as we propose to take money from the vaults of these great corporations and place it in the Treasury of the United States as security for the payment of debts payable in futuro and which the officers of the company have declared that they cannot and will not pay.

But, Mr. President, I believe it is the law in the State of Georgia, as it is the law to-day in Tennessee and in most of the States of the Union, that if a debtor offers to remove himself and his property from the State where the debt was created, in advance of the time for payment, that property may be seized, it may be impounded, and may be held until the debt shall have become due. Upon what principle does that legislation rest? Why is not that unconstitutional? Why does not that work a change in the contract between the parties?

Mr. HILL. That goes exactly upon this definite principle, that the debtor after he has made the debt is endangering its collection by his own act, not by the act of another, and he is changing the jurisdiction of the debt; he is traveling beyond the jurisdiction in which he created his debt.

Mr. BAILEY. Then the power of the Legislature rests not upon the fact that it is a Legislature. It is not an inherent power; it is not a power derived from the people; but the power is derived from the act of the absconding or fraudulent debtor.

Mr. HILL. The necessity for the legislation is derived from that act.

Mr. BAILEY. The necessity for the legislation? Who shall judge of its necessity? If the Congress has the right to enact laws on the subject, who can judge or inquire into their wisdom or necessity?

Mr. HILL. It would be unconstitutional for a Legislature to pass an act authorizing the property of a debtor to be seized before the debt is due, if he is not changing his situation, if he is not removing; and the legislation itself in this bill only seeks to have vitality upon the ground that he is not changing his jurisdiction.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Suppose he were wasting it?

Mr. HILL. Certainly; if he were wasting it, that would be the same thing.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Now what is the difference as to a corporation paying money to its stockholders, whence it never can come back, which it is confessedly necessary to get to pay its debts?

Mr. HILL. Ah, you have got no lien upon that income, no lien upon the earnings. You have a lien upon the corpus, and you would have a right, a perfect right, to proceed against that in such a case.

Mr. EDMUNDS. If I do not interrupt the Senator from Tennessee, may I ask the Senator from Georgia if every creditor of the corporation has not a lien upon every dollar of its income, by the nature of a corporate lien?

Mr. HILL. After the debt becomes due.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Have you not before the debt becomes due?

Mr. HILL. Not unless he is endangering the payment of the debt by his own act.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is the very question, whether he is not endangering it by dividends to the stockholders when confessedly if it goes on there will be nothing to pay the creditors with.

Mr. HILL. Confessedly, the creditor has elected his own security, confessedly the creditor has dedicated the corpus of the road to pay the debt; and confessedly the debtor is doing nothing to endanger that security.

Mr. EDMUNDS. But the Senator from Georgia carefully leaves out the proposition that I put to him, that upon the universal principles of law applied to corporations, no matter whether you have a mortgage security or not, every dollar of the assets and income of a corporation is a trust-fund for the payment of its creditors first, and for division among its stockholders afterward. Therefore, if a corporation, without regard to whether there is a mortgage lien or not, divides up its earnings among its stockholders to the danger of its creditors, it is violating the law of its existence.

Mr. HILL. I do say emphatically that no creditor of the road has any right as a legislature to pass acts and to administer a law to prevent the debtor from using the income of his property before the debt becomes due. He has a right to use the rents, issues, and profits of the property, and no law ever arrested it or can ever arrest it unless by so doing he is violating a contract. If he has included the rents, issues, and profits of the property in a mortgage, then he is bound. If he has not, then there is not any court on earth that can impound the income of a man's property in advance of the debt being due; nor was it ever done. I say broadly it never was done. It cannot be done in the nature of things, because when a man dedicates the corpus of the property to the payment of the debt, to that the creditor must look. The creditor has elected his security; the creditor has dedicated his security; he has fixed the debt on that security and he must rely on it. There is no lien in favor of an ordinary creditor against a debtor—none in the world. But I beg pardon of the Senator from Tennessee for having interrupted him.

Mr. BAILEY. Although that may never have been done by a court, yet such is the temper, and such are the convictions of the American Congress to-day, that it cannot hereafter be brought as a reproach against the courts of the United States that they will not entertain jurisdiction where a debtor has publicly and solemnly announced to his creditors that his purpose is so to administer his affairs as not only to bring a debt to mature at a future day in peril, but to bring it to absolute, positive, and certain loss—

Mr. HILL. Of course the unauthorized announcement of an officer amounts to nothing, but if there is any announcement by the corporation that they intend to bring this debt in danger by their act, the courts will give you ample remedy to restrain them.

Mr. HARRIS. Will the Senator not admit the fact that by reason of the dividends that have been paid and are being paid the ultimate security of this debt is not only hazarded, but it is rendered almost certain that it will prove a loss to the Government?

Mr. HILL. On the contrary, I say that by the appropriation of the income, the security selected by the Government for its debt is not only not impaired, is not only not lessened one dollar, but I say emphatically in this very contract which the Government made it has stipulated that the company shall use those earnings. It stipulated that as an inducement, in the eighteenth section, for them to build this road. Who supposes that anybody would have undertaken to build this road on an agreement that for thirty years there should be no earnings from it? Who supposes that any men would undertake to build the road on a distinct stipulation that they were to have no earnings for thirty years? There is a stipulation to pay the Government; but there is no stipulation that they shall have no earnings for thirty years. But the danger the courts will remedy; the future will give you a remedy not lessening the security which the contract has dedicated to the payment of your debt. I beg pardon of my friend for having interrupted him so long.

Mr. BAILEY. Not at all. I am very much obliged to the Senator. I was a little fatigued, and it gave me an opportunity to rest.

But the Senator asks in his concluding sentence who supposes that the parties contemplated that the Government of the United States would take all the earnings of these companies and leave nothing for them to distribute to their stockholders as a compensation for the capital that they have invested. I do not understand that to be the case. I understand from the reading of the bill presented to us by the Judiciary Committee of the Senate and the report which accompanies the bill that even after making these appropriations to the sinking fund there will be left from year to year to the stockholders of one of these companies a dividend of 6 per cent., and to the stockholders of the other not less than 4½ per cent.

Mr. HILL. Have you any more right to take half the income than you have to take the whole of it?

Mr. BAILEY. Not a bit of it. We have a right to take it all if necessary to prevent this meditated fraud. The Senator seems to suppose that because under the law as it exists—

Mr. TELLER. I ask the Senator if he will submit to an interruption? When the Senator says they have a right to take it all to avoid this meditated fraud, I should like to know to what he refers.

Mr. BAILEY. I refer to what they have announced; to the extracts from letters and speeches I have already read.

Mr. TELLER. I should like to know what they have announced.

Mr. BAILEY. They have announced it to be their purpose to divide their net earnings as between themselves and to leave this debt of the Government of the United States to accumulate; and they declare that the consequences and the natural consequences, the almost necessary consequences of their acts, will be to bring these companies to absolute bankruptcy and to cause the Government to lose a great part if not all of the debt that will be due in the future.

Mr. TELLER. Will the Senator answer this question: When the Government took this lien and postponed the payment of the debt until the maturity of the bonds, interest included, did they not guarantee not only by that provision but by a special provision that the companies might take these dividends? Are they not then living strictly within their contract when they take these dividends?

Mr. BAILEY. Considering the question from the point of view that I have now presented, I do not say that they have not the legal right to distribute this money. They have the legal right; I will concede that.

Mr. TELLER. I understood the Senator to say that they had not the legal right. Then I misunderstood the Senator.

Mr. BAILEY. I say they have a legal right to do it, but I say notwithstanding that it is a fraud that they contemplate perpetrating upon the Government of the United States by withdrawing what they may have the legal right to withdraw in the present state of the law, and without the remedial legislation that is proposed from the payment of their debts, and appropriating it to a division among themselves. But I am arguing here to prove that the Congress of the United States has a right to control them and to make that illegal which they claim is legal to-day.

Mr. TELLER. And which you admit is legal now, and yet you say this legislation does not change the contract?

Mr. BAILEY. Not at all. The Government has guaranteed nothing. The Government of the United States does not guarantee to its citizens that the law shall never be changed. In a case in 4 Otto, the very same claim was made that is made here to-day by a corporation chartered in the State of Illinois, that it had a vested interest in some way in the existing law, and although the Legislature of the State of Illinois changed the law, it was said the action of the Legislature was illegal and unconstitutional. The legislation was intended to change that which before had been right in a legal sense into what the law pronounced to be wrong. Chief-Justice Waite of the United States Supreme Court in commenting upon that says:

But a mere common-law regulation of trade or business may be changed by statute. A person has no property, no vested interest, in any rule of the common law.

You have no vested interest in that rule that gives you a right to distribute these earnings among the stockholders of this corporation as against the creditors.

That is only one of the forms of municipal law, and is no more sacred than any other. Rights of property which have been created by the common law cannot be taken away without due process; but the law itself, as a rule of conduct, may be changed at the will, or even at the whim, of the Legislature, unless prevented by constitutional limitations.—Munn vs. Illinois, 4 Otto, 135.

But there is another reason which has been alluded to by the Senator from Vermont, or which was alluded to a few moments ago, why this legislation may take place. He stated, and he stated what is unquestionably the law, that the property of every corporation is a trust fund for the payment of its debts, made so by intentment of law. The corporators are exempted in their natural persons and in their individual property from either arrest or seizure under execution, and from all the processes by which payment is compelled as between individuals in their contracts with each other; and when these corporators have paid into their treasury or have conveyed to the corporation money or property which is intended for the corporate use, from that moment it is dedicated to the corporate purposes and becomes a trust fund.

Judge Story rendered a decision in the case of Wood vs. Dummer, 3 Mason's Reports, in the year 1824, where the stockholders of a corporation had met together and their directors had distributed to them the money of the corporation, leaving the creditors unpaid. A bill was filed to compel them to refund the money and they were compelled to restore it.

Mr. TELLER. It was capital stock.

Mr. BAILEY. It may have been capital stock, but it was the property of the corporation. Do you mean to say that net earnings or profits are not property? Do you mean to say that no obligation rests upon the corporation to provide for the payment of a debt in the future? I will read a few lines from this decision.

The individual stockholders are not liable for the debts of the bank in their private capacities. The charter relieves them from personal responsibility and substitutes the capital stock in its stead. Credit is universally given to this fund by the public as the only means of repayment. During the existence of the corporation it is the sole property of the corporation, and can be applied only according to its charter; that is, as a fund for payment of its debts, upon the security of which it may discount and circulate notes. Why, otherwise, is any capital stock required by our charters? If the stock may, the next day after it is paid in, be withdrawn by the stockholders without payment of the debts of the corporation, why is its amount so studiously provided for and its payment by the stockholders so diligently required? To me this point appears so plain upon principles of law, as well as common sense, that I cannot be brought into any doubt that the charters of our banks make the capital stock a trust fund for the payment of all the debts of the corporation. The bill holders and other creditors have the first claims upon it, and the stockholders have no rights until all the other creditors are satisfied.

The capital stock was the subject of litigation in that particular case, and hence he was speaking of capital stock; but the idea, the reason, applies to property of every description. The decision made by Judge Story in this case of Wood vs. Dummer has been upheld by the courts of nearly every State in the Union. The position has been adopted and made the basis of frequent decisions by the Supreme Court of the United States, one of which is very well known to some of us in the South, the case of Curran vs. The State of Arkansas, reported in the fifteenth volume of Howard's Reports. Here is a trust fund dedicated to the payment of debts. Here is an obligation resting upon these people to make provision for the payment of this great debt. They say, however, that they will not do so and resist the attempt on the part of Congress to compel by law that to be done which they rest under the highest obligation to do. They say that there is no law that will authorize a bill in chancery to be filed to enforce this obligation. Then, sir, we will make a law: the obligation shall no longer be imperfect; legislatures are established to enact laws, and to correct defects in the written or unwritten law, whenever these defects may be discovered or the business affairs of life shall bring them to notice.

Now, the jurisdiction of courts of equity in regard to trust funds of this kind is unquestioned. It is usually exercised in cases of an insolvent corporation or one whose charter has expired, been annulled, or revoked; but the principle settled by the case of Wood vs. Dummer and the case of Curran vs. The State of Arkansas is, that property of a corporation is a trust fund for the payment of debts. The principle stands whether the corporation be solvent or insolvent, whether its charter continues in force or has been annulled or has expired by lapse of time. It may be that under the present state of the law where a corporation in the full possession of its franchises shall from year to year divide its earnings between the stockholders in such a manner as to imperil the rights of creditors whose debts are not due, the court will not feel authorized to interfere to control the action of its officers, but the refusal to exercise jurisdiction in such a case is because the creditors cannot maintain an action until the debt becomes due. Notwithstanding this, however, the property is a trust fund, and the highest moral obligation rests upon the officers to so administer its affairs as to protect the rights of creditors who are entitled to priority of payment over the stockholders, and this becomes a legal obligation whenever a right of action accrues to the creditors.

Now, may not the remedy be advanced without injustice to the stockholders? If the conduct of the officers manifests an unmistakable purpose to bring the corporation to a state of bankruptcy, if they shall refuse to be governed by the ordinary rules of business prudence and care, and when the necessity is obvious refuse to provide a sinking fund for the payment of debts to mature in the future, that cannot otherwise be paid, can they with any propriety object that the law-making power shall require them to do so or shall provide a remedy that will protect the creditor against a meditated wrong?

It is objected that such legislation will divest vested rights. What right is taken away? What vested interest is disturbed by such legislation? The corporation is left in the undisturbed possession of all franchises and all its property. It continues to transact its legitimate business and to make such profits as that business will fairly earn, but is required to do what every government and every corporation whose affairs are managed with any regard to prudence or the just rights of creditors will voluntarily undertake to do.

Is the power to perpetrate a fraud, to be recognized as a vested right? If the law be defective, shall it not be amended and made to conform to the wants and exigencies of society?

Mr. BLAINE obtained the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. (Mr. INGALLS in the chair.) The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. MATTHEWS.]

Mr. HAMLIN. I apprehend that Senators who are not in their places do not expect to vote upon the pending question at the present time, and I move that we now proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Maine moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After one hour and thirty-three minutes spent in executive session, the doors were reopened.

ADJOURNMENT TO MONDAY.

On motion of Mr. EDMUNDS, it was Ordered, That when the Senate adjourns to-day it be to meet on Monday next.

REPORT OF COMMITTEE.

Mr. TELLER, from the Committee on Railroads, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 927) to authorize the construction of a narrow-gauge railroad from Bismarck to the Black Hills, reported it with amendments.

BILL INTRODUCED.

Mr. WITHERS asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1013) granting a pension to Mrs. Susan Nussar; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion of Mr. ALLISON, it was—Ordered, That the petition and papers relating to the claim of John S. Logan be taken from the files and referred to the Committee on Claims.

WATER-FRONT AT VICKSBURG.

Mr. LAMAR submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, instructed to transmit to the Senate copies of the report of a board of engineers on the preservation of the water-front at Vicksburg, Mississippi, and of the letter of the Chief of Engineers submitting the same, with the maps and estimates in relation thereto which have been prepared by said board.

CLAIM OF CHAUNCEY M. LOCKWOOD.

Mr. FERRY submitted the following order; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Ordered, That 50 copies of the argument in relation to the claim of Chauncey M. Lockwood be printed for the use of the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

Mr. ALLISON. I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at four o'clock and ten minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, March 28, 1878.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. P. HARRISON.
The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of its clerks, informed the House that the Senate had passed, with amendments in which the concurrence of the House was requested, a bill of the following title:

A bill (H. R. No. 3064) making appropriations for the consular and diplomatic service of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1879, and for other purposes.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. SOUTHARD. I hope the House will give unanimous consent to change the reference of a bill.

Mr. HALE. I demand the regular order of business.

The regular order being demanded, the question recurred on the following resolutions, reported by the majority of the Committee of Elections:

Resolved, That Walbridge A. Field is not entitled to a seat in this House as the Representative from the third congressional district of the State of Massachusetts.
Resolved, That Benjamin Dean is entitled to a seat in this House as the Representative from the third congressional district of the State of Massachusetts.

Mr. SPRINGER. The House is not full at this time, and, if there be no objection, I hope there will be a morning hour before the unfinished business of yesterday is taken up for consideration. I ask by unanimous consent that there be a morning hour for reports from committees.

Mr. HALE. I demand the regular order.

Mr. SPRINGER. I rise to ask unanimous consent that there be a morning hour this morning, as the House is now thin.

Mr. HALE. Let us have the regular order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. SPRINGER. It would enable us to have a full House to allow the morning hour to intervene before proceeding with the election case.

The SPEAKER. The main question has been ordered, and, the regular order being demanded, the question recurs on the resolutions reported from the majority of the Committee of Elections which have just been read.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires there shall be perfect order during the roll-call for reasons which must be manifest to every person on the floor. If there be any noise the Chair will direct the call to be suspended until order is restored.

Mr. SPRINGER. Is it in order to move the House do now adjourn? I am advised there are a number of members absent, and I make the motion for the purpose of giving them an opportunity to come in. Is the motion in order?

The SPEAKER. It is.

Mr. SPRINGER. Then I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. Let the gentleman move that there be a call of the House.

Mr. FRYE. Had not the call commenced?

The SPEAKER. It had not.

Mr. SPRINGER. If the motion be in order, I will move that there be a call of the House, and on that motion demand the yeas and nays.

Mr. HALE. Is that motion in order while the main question is pending?

The SPEAKER. The motion to adjourn is in order. In reference to the question of order raised by the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. HALE,] whether at this time, the main question having been ordered to be now put, the motion that there be a call of the House is in order, the Clerk will read a part of Rule 132.

The Clerk read as follows:
A call of the House shall not be in order after the previous question is seconded, unless it shall appear, upon an actual count by the Speaker, that no quorum is present.

The SPEAKER. The motion that there be a call of the House is not in order at this time.

Mr. SPRINGER. I move, then, that the House do now adjourn, and on that motion demand the yeas and nays.

Mr. FORT. What is the object of the gentleman in moving the House to adjourn?

Mr. SPRINGER. The House is not full, and I desire to give members who are not present an opportunity to come in before the vote is taken on the election case.

Mr. THOMPSON. Who is absent?

The yeas and nays were ordered.
The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 4, nays 231, not voting 56; as follows:

Mr. JONES, of Alabama. Mr. Speaker, upon the resolution voted upon yesterday declaring that Mr. FIELD was entitled to a seat in this House, I voted "ay" under the belief that he had been elected according to the laws of Massachusetts. But the House decided against this view of the law. Therefore, under this decision by the House, upon the pending resolution declaring Mr. Dean entitled to a seat, I vote "ay." [Applause from the democratic side.]

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires that perfect order may prevail while the Clerk reads the names, so that gentlemen may know exactly how they are recorded.

Mr. CONGER. The applause was not on this side of the House.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the noise is a little on both sides of the House and wishes to prevent it on each side.

Mr. CONGER. I said the applause was not on this side of the House.

The SPEAKER. On this question the Chair desires to cast his vote and directs the Clerk to call his name.

The Clerk called the name of Mr. RANDALL.

The SPEAKER. I vote "ay."
The result of the vote was then announced as above recorded.
Mr. SPRINGER moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolutions were adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.
Mr. SPRINGER. I now ask that the oath be administered to Mr. Dean.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will step forward.
Mr. CONGER. Has the question been put on the motion to lay the motion to reconsider on the table?

The SPEAKER. It has.
Mr. CONGER. I do not think that anybody heard it.
The SPEAKER. That is not the fault of the Chair.

Mr. CONGER. I have stood here waiting to hear that question put, that I might call for the yeas and nays upon it.

The SPEAKER. The Chair stated the question distinctly.
Mr. CONGER. Then the Chair spoke in a very low tone.
The SPEAKER. The Chair did not.

Mr. CONGER. The Chair must have spoken in a very low tone. [Cries of "Order!"]

Mr. SPRINGER. I heard the Speaker state the motion distinctly.
Mr. KENNA. And it was heard distinctly even in this distant part of the Hall.

Mr. DEAN then appeared and qualified by taking the oath prescribed by section 1756 of the Revised Statutes.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. HARRISON. I rise to a privileged question, and it is to call up the report of the Committee on Reform in the Civil Service, in the matter commonly known as the Polk matter.

Mr. BLAIR. I hope before the gentleman presses that motion he will allow me to report a bill for the purpose of having it printed, as one of the committees of the House desires to consider it to-morrow morning and the printing of it will greatly facilitate their labors.

Mr. CONGER. I insist upon the regular order. I want nothing to intervene between these two matters.

Mr. EDEN. I submit that the report of the Committee on Reform in the Civil Service has not yet been made.

Mr. HARRISON. I call for the reading of the report.

Mr. EDEN. My understanding is that the report was ordered to be printed and recommended to the committee, and that therefore it is now in the committee.

The SPEAKER. The report was made and recommended to the committee, and ordered to be printed; and the Chair supposes that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HARRISON] now intends to report it back to the House.

Mr. SCALES. Is it in order to raise the question of consideration?

The SPEAKER. It is.

Mr. SCALES. If so, I raise it, for I desire to move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, for the purpose of taking up the bill transferring the Indian Bureau from the Interior Department to the War Department.

Mr. DURHAM. I desire to antagonize that motion with an appropriation bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. HARRISON,] from the Committee on Reform in the Civil Service, presents the report of that committee touching on the matters referred to it, as to the Doorkeeper of this House, and the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. SCALES] raises the question of consideration, and he gives notice that if this subject be not considered by the House he will move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and to lay aside the bills upon the Calendar until the committee shall reach the bill relating to the transfer of the Indian Bureau to the War Department.

Mr. DURHAM. Now I desire to antagonize that by asking the House to consider the report of the Committee on Appropriations and the amendments of the Senate to the bill authorizing the employment of additional clerks, &c.

The SPEAKER. The Chair cannot present the question in that shape. The question of consideration must be between two subjects.

Mr. DURHAM. You are right, sir; but I desire to notify the House that I shall endeavor to call up the bill to which I have referred.

Mr. HENDEE. I desire also to give notice that I desire to call up the District of Columbia bill, that it may be considered at this time.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. And I desire to give notice, too, that if the House goes into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, I shall press the consideration of the bill in relation to the pensions of the soldiers of the Mexican war.

Mr. BEEBE. I rise to make a parliamentary inquiry. Is not the question of consideration merely upon the motion of the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. HARRISON,] and not as between that and any other proposition?

The SPEAKER. Each member must vote as his judgment dictates. The question immediately before the House is whether the House will now consider the report of the Committee on Reform in the Civil Service in relation to the Doorkeeper of the House. If that be voted down, then the Chair will be in duty bound to recognize the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. SCALES] to make his motion, as the Chair has already recognized him as antagonizing the motion of the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. HARRISON.]

Mr. BEEBE. Would it be competent, in case the report of the gentleman from Illinois should not be considered, to raise the question of consideration by the motion of the gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. SCALES?]

The SPEAKER. It would be; but not until the prior question is disposed of.

Mr. EDEN. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry.
The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. EDEN. Would not it be in order to—
Mr. THOMPSON. I call for the regular order.

Mr. EDEN. I am rising to a parliamentary inquiry.
The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. EDEN] is rising to a question which he has a right to put.

Mr. EDEN. Would not it be in order for the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. DURHAM] to move to go into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering an appropriation bill?

The SPEAKER. The Chair has already recognized the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. HARRISON,] and the most direct way to reach the views of the House is the way provided for by the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. SCALES] when he raises the question of consideration.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. This question of the Doorkeeper has an important bearing on appropriations. [Laughter.]

Mr. HARRISON. I object to debate.

The SPEAKER. A question relating to the priority of business is not debatable.

The question was put upon Mr. HARRISON's motion; and on a viva voce vote the Chair announced that the yeas had it.

Mr. JAMES. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 107, nays 123, not voting 61; as follows:

So the House refused to proceed to the consideration of the report in the case of the Doorkeeper.

During the call of the roll the following announcements were made: Mr. MARTIN. I am paired with Mr. HUBBELL, of Michigan. If he were here, I would vote "no" and I presume he would vote "ay."

Mr. BAKER, of Indiana. On political questions I am paired with Mr. SPARKES, of Illinois. If here, he would vote "no" and I would vote "ay."

Mr. SMITH, of Pennsylvania. I am paired with Mr. ATKINS, of Tennessee. If here, he would vote "no" and I would vote "ay."

Mr. FOSTER. I am paired with Mr. WADDELL, of North Carolina. I am in doubt whether the pair would reach this case, but I prefer not to vote in his absence.

Mr. HAZELTON. I am paired with Mr. CLYMER, of Pennsylvania. I do not know how he would vote on this question if he were here; therefore I prefer not to vote.

The result of the vote was then announced as above stated.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. SCALES. I now move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole, for the purpose of taking up and considering the bill for the transfer of the Indian Bureau to the War Department.

Mr. FOSTER. I ask the gentleman to yield to me, to bring up a matter which should be considered at once.

Mr. SCALES. I will yield for matters that give rise to no debate.

CONTINGENT FUND OF THE SENATE AND HOUSE.

Mr. FOSTER, from the Committee on Appropriations, reported back the bill (H. R. No. 3846) to provide for a deficiency in the miscellaneous fund of the House of Representatives, with the Senate amendment thereto.

The amendment of the Senate was read, as follows:

After line 4 insert:

That the following sums be, and the same are hereby, appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to meet the contingent expenses of the Senate, namely:

For miscellaneous items, $20,000.

For folding books, speeches, and pamphlets at the prices specified in the legislative act for the current fiscal year, $1,500.

Mr. FOSTER. The Committee on Appropriations recommend that the amendment of the Senate be concurred in.

The amendment of the Senate was concurred in.

Mr. FOSTER. The Senate also make an amendment to the title.

The amendment of the Senate to the title was concurred in, so as make the title read: "An act to provide for deficiencies in the miscellaneous fund of the Senate and of the House of Representatives."

Mr. FOSTER moved to reconsider the votes just taken; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

REMOVAL OF DESKS FROM THE HALL.

Mr. YOUNG. I am instructed by the Select Committee on the Ventilation of the Hall to present a report and accompanying resolution and to ask that they be printed in the RECORD. I desire to give notice, by instruction of the committee, that after the morning hour on Tuesday next, I will call up this report for action.

There being no objection, the following report and accompanying resolution were laid on the table and ordered to be printed in the RECORD:

The Committee on Ventilation of the Hall of the House of Representatives, to which was referred House resolution passed March 4, 1878, directing them to "inquire and report whether or not the removal of the desks from the Hall is in any way necessary in arranging for the proper ventilation of the same, and how far such removal will conduce to the convenience of members and the dispatch of public business," beg leave respectfully to report:

That they have given a careful consideration to the two questions presented in the resolution, and are of the opinion that the removal of the members' desks is not absolutely essential to a thorough and perfect ventilation of the Hall; except in this respect, that such removal would give space for larger openings for the admission of fresh air, though it is possible that this object might be attained by other methods, but they would be less convenient and more expensive. It is believed by the committee that the plan of ventilation adopted by the commission created for that purpose during the Forty-fourth Congress, and which has been in a great measure carried out, will, when completed, afford as perfect ventilation as can be procured with the present architecture of the Hall, even without any interference with the desks, though their removal would doubtless aid this plan in the way suggested.

In regard to convenience of members and the proper dispatch of public business, the committee are of opinion that it is very desirable that the desks should be removed. The effect of this would be to so narrow the circle of seats as to bring the outer row thirteen feet nearer the Speaker's stand, leaving that much of space between the rear seats and the iron railing which now surrounds them. For the convenience of writing it is proposed to place a row of tables of suitable length and height for the purpose in the rear of the members' seats, immediately inside the railing, where it is believed members will find it more agreeable to write than at their desks as is at present done, while it is also proposed to attach to each chair a small board or flange for the purpose of such writing as members may desire to do at their seats. In case these suggestions should be adopted the committee think it would be desirable that a small table, three or four feet square, should be placed in each of the four sections into which the space occupied by the seats is divided, from which members who desired to do so could speak.

The committee think it probable that some inconvenience would be felt at first should the desks be removed, but this would soon pass away and be overcome, as the committee is fully convinced, by the many advantages which would result from the change.

A diagram of the floor of the Hall is submitted with this report, which shows in detail the alterations and changes which it is proposed to make. The committee therefore respectfully recommend the passage of the resolution which is herewith submitted.

Very respectfully,

CASEY YOUNG.
C. M. SHELLEY.
ADDISON OLIVER.
J. W. STONE.
J. G. CARLISLE.
JAMES M. COVERT.

Be it resolved by the House of Representatives of the United States of America, That the architect of the Capitol extension is hereby directed to make such alterations and changes in the Hall of the House of Representatives, under the direction of the Committee on Ventilation, as are set out and suggested in the report of said committee this day presented and adopted: Provided, The cost of such alterations and changes shall not exceed the sum of $1,500, to be paid out of the contingent fund of the House.

Mr. CONGER. I suppose that none of the papers now being referred can be brought back on a motion to reconsider.

Mr. AIKEN. I ask unanimous consent to submit for reference to the Committee on the Judiciary the resolution which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be, and they are hereby, instructed to inquire into the present status of lands on the sea-coast of South Carolina sold by the United States Government under the direct-tax sales in the year 1862, and subsequently; and that in conducting said inquiry the said committee is hereby empowered to send for persons and papers.

Resolved, That said committee report the result of its investigations to the House with such recommendations as will best subserve the interests of all parties concerned.

Mr. CONGER. I object to that part of this resolution authorizing the sending for persons and papers.

Mr. AIKEN. If the House will allow me just one word, I will state why that clause is put in. The Government is now erecting a light-house upon one of the points mentioned in the resolution; but operations have been suspended from the simple fact that it cannot establish a claim to the land on which the light-house is being built.

The SPEAKER. This is for reference only.

Mr. CONGER. I thought it was for action, giving the power—

The SPEAKER. It is only for reference.

The resolution was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. CONGER. Not to be brought back by a motion to reconsider.

The SPEAKER. It will be so ordered, there being no objection.

VINCENNES UNIVERSITY, INDIANA.

PAULINA JONES.

Mr. VANCE also, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4126) for the relief of Paulina Jones, widow of Alexander Jones, deceased, Company E, Second North Carolina Infantry; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

CHARLES BOMBONNEL.

Mr. MANNING moved, by unanimous consent, that leave be granted for the withdrawal from the files of the House of the papers in the case of Charles Bombonnel, reported adversely by the Committee on War Claims in the Forty-third Congress.

The SPEAKER. The application, under the rule, will be referred to the Committee on War Claims.

MARY E. LACIA.

On motion of Mr. WOOD, by unanimous consent, leave was granted for the withdrawal from the files of the House of the papers in the case of Mary E. Lacia, no adverse report having been made.

JOHN A. SUTTER.

On motion of Mr. SCHLEICHER, by unanimous consent, leave was granted for the withdrawal from the files of the House of the papers in the case of John A. Sutter, no adverse report having been made.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted in the following cases:

To Mr. KILLINGER, for one week.

To Mr. BRIDGES, for one week, on account of important business.

To Mr. WADDELL, until Monday next, on account of important business.

To Mr. STEELE, for ten days, on account of his health.

To Mr. HANNA, until Thursday next, on account of important business.

To Mr. HAYES, for two weeks, on account of important business.

To Mr. THORNBURGH, indefinitely, on account of sickness.

R. G. HATFIELD.

METRICAL SYSTEM.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, relative to the adoption of the metrical system of weights and measures; which was referred to the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures.

APPROPRIATIONS FOR SIOUX INDIANS.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the acting Secretary of the Interior, relative to certain Indian appropriations heretofore asked; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

LEASING THE WRIGHT BUILDING.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the acting Secretary of the Interior, asking that authority be conferred on that Department to lease the building corner of Eighth and G streets, known as the Wright building, now temporarily occupied by said Department, for one year from June 30th, next, and asking an appropriation to pay the rent therefor; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

SOLDIERS MONUMENT, AVON, NEW YORK.

The SPEAKER also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting a report of the Chief of Ordnance in connection with House resolution No. 129, authorizing the Secretary of War to deliver to the town of Avon, Livingston County, New York, four cannon for the soldiers' monument in said town; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

JAMES REA.

Mr. CONGER, by unanimous consent, presented the memorial of James Rea, late United States consul at Belfast, asking relief; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. SCALES] moves that the rules be suspended and that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. CONGER. I submit that the regular order is the morning hour, and that as against the morning hour the motion of the gentleman from North Carolina is not privileged.

The SPEAKER. The motion to go into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union is in order at all times.

Mr. CONGER. Not till after the morning hour.

The SPEAKER. The motion is in order at any time. The gentleman from Michigan is confounding with this the motion to go to business on the Speaker's table. The motion to go to business on the Speaker's table is only in order after the morning hour. The motion that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union is in order at any time.

Mr. CONGER. Then I raise the question of consideration on that motion in order that we may have the morning hour.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will read Rule 104:

The House may at any time, by a vote of a majority of the members present, suspend the rules and orders for the purpose of going into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union; and also for providing for the discharge of the Committee of the Whole House and the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. DURHAM. I rise to a privileged question.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. DURHAM. I desire to make a privileged report from the Committee on Appropriations, and raise in that way the question of consideration on the motion of the gentleman from North Carolina.

Mr. CONGER. I make the point of order that the House was dividing on another proposition.

The SPEAKER. There is a matter already pending. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. DURHAM] at the proper time. The gentleman from North Carolina moves that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. DURHAM. Does the Chair not recognize me to raise a privileged question?

The SPEAKER. The Chair states that there is a motion already pending and does not recognize the gentleman from Kentucky at present to make his motion.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. Pending the motion of the gentleman from North Carolina I move that when in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union we shall again consider the bill (H. R. No. 257) granting pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Mexican and other wars therein named, all debate upon the pending section and amendments thereto be closed in ten minutes.

Mr. HENDEE. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. If all these motions be lost will it then be proper to move to take up the District of Columbia bill?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the District of Columbia bill is in the position of unfinished business; and the Chair understands that these motions are made with the consent of the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. HENDEE] provided that the unfinished business shall not lose its priority when he shall see fit to demand the consideration of it. These motions in fact are raising the question of present consideration as against the District of Columbia bill; and if the House shall vote affirmatively, the effect will be to bring up other business than the unfinished business, which is the District of Columbia bill, but it will not lose its place as unfinished business.

Mr. HENDEE. I understand that; but I continually call attention to this bill because I am afraid it will be forgotten.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks not. The Chair thinks the gentleman from Vermont is very vigilant. [Laughter.]

The question being taken on the motion of Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama, there were—ayes 55, noes 93.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. I call for the yeas and nays.

The question being taken on ordering the yeas and nays, there were ayes 22.

So (the affirmative not being one-fifth of the last vote) the yeas and nays were not ordered, and the motion of Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama, was not agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question recurs on the motion of the gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. SCALES] that the rules be suspended and that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. WRIGHT. I move that the House adjourn.

The question being put, on a division, by sound, the Speaker announced. The yeas have it.

Mr. WRIGHT. The yeas appear to have it. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. The yeas have it. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from North Carolina.

Mr. CONGER. On that I raise the question of consideration for the purpose of having a morning hour.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan reaches his object by voting against the motion. He states that he votes against the motion of the gentleman from North Carolina because he wants to have a morning hour.

The question being taken on the motion of Mr. SCALES, there were—ayes 43, noes 95.

So the motion was not agreed to.

Mr. HENDEE. I now call up the unfinished business, being the consideration of the bill providing a form of government for the District of Columbia.

Mr. DURHAM. I move that the House proceed to consider the Senate amendments to the bill (H. R. No. 3102) authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to employ temporary clerks, and making an appropriation for the same; also making appropriations for detecting trespasses on public lands, and for bringing into market public lands in certain States, and for other purposes.

Mr. CONGER. I do not wish to antagonize the appropriation bill. Therefore I do not insist on the morning hour.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Vermont [Mr. HENDEE] is demanding his right, which is the consideration of the unfinished business, being the bill providing a permanent form of government for the District of Columbia.

The question being taken on Mr. HENDEE's motion, there were—ayes 71, noes 70.

Mr. EDEN. A quorum has not voted.

The SPEAKER. A quorum not having voted, the Chair will order tellers, and appoints Mr. SCALES and Mr. HENDEE.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 78, noes 68.

So the House agreed to proceed with the consideration of the unfinished business.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maine [Mr. HALE] will take the chair as Speaker pro tempore.

GOVERNMENT OF THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

The House, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 3259) providing a permanent form of government for the District of Columbia.

Mr. EDEN. I wish to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. EDEN. After general debate is closed on this bill, will it then be read by sections and be subject to debate and amendment as in Committee of the Whole?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The House is considering the bill as in Committee of the Whole, and after general debate is terminated the bill will be read by sections for amendment as though in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. EDEN. Can that be prevented by calling the previous question?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair thinks not. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BRENTANO] has the floor.

Mr. BRENTANO. Mr. Speaker, whatever the differences of opinion in the committee in regard to the details of this bill may have been, I can state that it was the unanimous desire of the committee to give the District of Columbia an honest and efficient government and to divide the expenses of the District government between the United States and the tax-payers of the District in a fair proportion. In regard to the features of the bill to which I could not agree, the most obnoxious, I am glad to hear, will be amended by the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. BLACKBURN,] and that is the provision in the bill that when contracts are let the military member of the District of Columbia commissioners shall have a veto power. This provision of the bill is an extraordinary one in a country where the principle prevails that the military power shall always be subordinate to the civil power. I would never consent to vote for the bill if this provision were not stricken out.

Mr. Speaker, all we want and all I desire in the government of the District of Columbia is an honest and efficient non-partisan government. At the present time we have a temporary government, organized by the act of 1874, by which three commissioners are intrusted with the administration of the government of the District, and these commissioners are appointed by the President of the United States, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate.

The bill now pending provides also that three commissioners shall form the government of the District, but they shall not be as now appointed by the President of the United States. One is to be elected by the Senate, one by the House of Representatives, while the third one shall be a military officer of the Engineer Corps of a certain rank detailed, not appointed, but detailed by the President.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I ask why shall we take away from the President his constitutional power to appoint the officers who are to form the Government in this District? Why shall we put the election of two of them into the hands of Congress and only leave the President to detail as the third commissioner an officer of the rank in the Army which is prescribed in the bill?

If we look at the Constitution of the United States we find that the Government is divided into three separate branches: the first one, the legislative; the second, the executive, and the third, the judicial.

The Constitution defines the powers of Congress. It gives to Congress the power to exercise legislation in general, and to exercise exclusive legislation in all cases whatever over the District of Columbia and over all places purchased for the erection of forts, magazines, dock-yards, and arsenals of the United States.

While the powers of Congress are restricted to legislative acts, the appointment of officers belongs to the President, and, except in such cases as are otherwise provided for in the Constitution itself, the President has to make all appointments.

I have therefore a grave constitutional doubt whether Congress can, by a law such as this bill, take away from the President the power of appointing the officers who are to form the government of the District of Columbia.

But even if no constitutional doubts existed in my mind it would still be for me a question whether it was good policy to give the selection of two commissioners, one to the House of Representatives and one to the Senate. In this connection I desire to refer to Story on the Constitution where he says:

The suggestions already made upon the treaty-making power, and the inconveniences of vesting it in Congress, apply with great force to that of vesting the power of appointment to office in the same body. It would enable candidates for office to introduce all sorts of cabals, intrigues, and coalitions into Congress, and not only distract their attention from their proper legislative duties, but probably in a very high degree influence all legislative measures. A new source of division and corruption would thus be infused into the public councils, stimulated by private interests and pressed by personal solicitations. What would be to be done in case the Senate and House should disagree in an appointment? Are they to vote in convention or as distinct bodies? There would be practical difficulties attending both courses, and experience has not justified the belief that either would conduce either to good appointments or to due responsibility.

The same reasoning would apply to vesting the power exclusively in either branch of the Legislature. It would make the patronage of the Government subservient to private interests, and bring into suspicion the motives and conduct of members of the appointing body.

I maintain that in the interest of an honest and efficient government for the District of Columbia we should keep out of the Halls of Congress the election of commissioners for this District.

In regard to the provision authorizing or directing the President to detail as a third commissioner, for the term of three years, an officer of the Engineer Corps, whose lineal rank shall be above that of captain, I have also great constitutional doubts. If the President has the authority to appoint such officer to a civil office certainly we have no right to restrict him in that appointment. We have no right to tell the President from what class of citizens he shall appoint to this or any other officer. We have no right to confine him in his selection of officers for the District of Columbia or for any other purpose to a certain class of military officers.

But, Mr. Speaker, how does this provision of the bill correspond with the principle which is laid down in the constitution of every State of this Union, that the military power shall always be kept in strict subordination to the civil power? And yet here it is proposed that the President shall select a military officer and none other as one of the officers at the head of the government of the District of Columbia.

These are some of my objections to this portion of the bill; but I have other objections. I find in this bill a provision that those District commissioners which are to be selected by the Senate and House of Representatives shall be taken not only from the citizens of the United States but from actual residents of the District who have resided here for at least ten years previous to their election, and who have during that period claimed no residence elsewhere.

I have looked over the constitutions of the several States of the Union, and I find that in no one of them is an actual residence of ten years required from a candidate for the highest executive office in any State. I find that the time of residence required to make a person eligible to the office of governor of a State varies from seven years down to one year. For instance, it is seven years in Arkansas, six years in Delaware, five years in California, two years in Illinois and Indiana, and only one year in Minnesota.

Now, if for the high office of governor of a State, who is clothed with far greater powers than one of the triumvirs of the District of Columbia, a man is eligible after from one to seven years' residence in the State, why should we require that a member of the board of commissioners for the District of Columbia shall be an actual resident of the District for at least ten years?

Even with the lesser restriction of residence of from one to seven years required in the various States to render a man eligible to the office of governor, it should be borne in mind that that restriction is a restriction of the universal suffrage of the right of the citizens to select their rulers.

But when it is proposed in this bill that when the Senate and House of Representatives shall each elect one of these District commissioners we, the Representatives of the States and of the people, shall restrict ourselves in that selection to such citizens as have been actually residents of this District for ten years, I say that is a restriction put upon the highest legislative body of the nation without any cause whatever. If the States can intrust every voter to select for governor any person who has resided in that State from one to seven years, according to the constitution of the State, why should we restrict ourselves to the selection of persons who have resided in this District for at least ten years?

But, Mr. Speaker, there are some other reasons why we should not be restricted in our judgment in this way. This bill proposes that the United States shall pay 50 per cent. of all the expenses of the government of the District of Columbia. Now, when we propose that the Government of the United States shall pay one-half of the expenses of this District, should we restrict ourselves in the election of the men intrusted with its government to the actual settlers of this District, who have resided here for at least ten years? Or shall we not have the right to select as commissioners men among the citizens of the United States wherever we can find them, if they are only good, honest, and reliable—men who will act in the interest of the District and at the same time have the interest of the Treasury of the United States at heart?

I have asked myself what could be the reason why in this bill should be inserted a clause requiring the commissioners to have been actual residents of this District for ten years, thereby excluding good men from being selected to those responsible offices. Should it be possible, what I can hardly believe, that the object and purpose was to exclude certain persons from being selected as commissioners of this District? Since the administration of the present President began, Mr. Thomas B. Bryan has been appointed as one of the commissioners of this District. Mr. Bryan has not been a resident of this District for any length of time, but he is considered one of the best, one of the most efficient, one of the most honest men who could have been selected for the office of commissioner of this District.

Mr. Speaker, if we should pass this bill as it now stands, we would be prohibited from electing such as Mr. Bryan, upon whom I look with pride as one who by his many public virtues has once been an honored citizen of Chicago, where he enjoyed the reputation of a man of integrity, of a man of the best intentions, a man of the strictest honesty, whom once a great party honored by the nomination as their candidate for the office of mayor of our city; and when I came here and saw that the citizens of this District hold Mr. Bryan in the same high regard, I felt not only proud, but I congratulated the District on the acquisition they had made in my former townsman. Why, then, should we bind our hands here and give up the power of selecting a man like Mr. Bryan as one of the commissioners of this District because he has not resided here ten years, although nearly all his worldly interest is invested in the city of Washington?

These two are my main objections to this bill. I object to the bill because it takes the power of selecting these high officers for this District from the President, who now has the power to appoint the commissioners of the District just as he has the constitutional right to appoint the judges, the recorders, and several other officers of this District. I maintain that there is no cause why we should take away from the President his constitutional prerogative. Even if the House should be of the opinion that the Constitution does not forbid that the Congress should elect such officers, it seem to me very impolitic to throw such elections, and with them all the evils which Story so vividly described, in the two Houses of Congress. I shall have occasion when we come to consider the bill by sections to offer some amendments in the sense indicated by me, and hope that the bill may be stripped of the obnoxious features so that I can vote for it.

GOVERNMENT OF THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

The House then resumed the consideration of the bill in relation to a permanent form of government for the District of Columbia.

Mr. COX, of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, I agree in many respects—perhaps in all respects—with the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BRENTANO] who has just spoken. I approach this bill, however, from a standpoint which seems to me radically different from that of those who brought it here. Whenever the time shall have come for Congress to consider what should be the permanent government for the District of Columbia, we need to examine the subject in a totally different manner from that in which this bill presents it.

I am one of those who believe that the government of the District by a commission was, at the time such a government was determined upon, a necessity; but I wish to be distinctly understood as putting that necessity upon the basis of other measures which grew necessarily out of the war. Washington was for a long time the headquarters of a great army. It was a fortified camp. It was the place of refuge for those colored people of the South who collected here from the whole district of Virginia over which the Army of the Potomac was campaigning. It was also the place of refuge for many white people who claimed no permanent establishment here. The result of this was, as we all know, that there was here a large floating population, much of it a pauper population. It was dependent for its subsistence upon rations issued by the Commissary Department of the Army. It was dependent, a little later, either upon the charity of the local government or upon the employment which was made by the District authorities in order to give to these people the daily means of life.

Under these circumstances the problem of a safe government was one of no ordinary difficulty. It was met as an exceptional one. It was solved as a war measure, so far as it was solved at all; and we have been simply waiting for the time to come when the ordinary conditions of peace would be so far restored that we might have here the opportunity of re-establishing a government which should be in accordance with the democratic principles of the Constitution of the United States. Such a government we have not had.

The power of Congress over all subjects of legislation for the District implies also the responsibility for the right solution of this problem. We might consent that what was a war measure only shall continue until we are quite sure what ought to be substituted for it. We may, we ought to improve as far as we can this system which has been accepted provisionally, removing from it some of the inconsistencies which have crept into it or were originally there.

For instance, I grant that the independence of the board of health, and also, I believe, of the Metropolitan police, with respect to the commissioners, are obstacles in the way of good government, which ought not to continue; and even though this provisional form of government is to remain in force still longer, these things ought to be corrected.

But since this bill is brought forward as a definite settlement of the District government it must necessarily be examined, not as a mere palliative of some of the evils in this provisional organization, but as an attempt on the part of the Congress of the United States to establish here a government which deserves to be permanent; and I insist that if we pass this bill we shall give a severe shock to the faith of our people all over the land in our ability as a Congress of the United States even to understand what belongs to a municipal organization.

The problem is a difficult one everywhere. If we take the great city of New York as an example, we know full well that thinking men of all parties have been greatly puzzled with the question how in such a city, with a large floating population, much of it dependent perhaps upon charity, not having any permanent residence, giving none of the guarantees of intelligence or even of honesty that may be required to make a good popular government, we may still have one which shall be at once republican and safe, which shall accord with the general democratic principles of our Constitution, and at the same time give us the necessary provision for order, security, and economy of administration.

If in like manner we go to the cities of the South, the same problem is presented, with only a variation of conditions. We shall be judged, and rightly judged, by the world as having here chosen what we think a satisfactory form of government for a municipality, adapted alike to New Orleans, to Mobile, to Savannah, to Richmond. We are here undertaking to decide what should be the method of governing cities in which there is a large element of ignorant and dependent people, of different races, tendencies, and prejudices—an element which, in the opinion of many honest and intelligent persons, makes an unsafe population and one unfit to have full control of local government, local taxation, and local expenditures.

Mr. MAYHAM. Will the gentleman from Ohio allow me a question?

Mr. COX, of Ohio. Certainly.

Mr. MAYHAM. Does not the gentleman from Ohio recognize a difference in the condition of this District and that of the city of New York or New Orleans—a constitutional difference?

Mr. COX, of Ohio. I certainly do, and I am going to speak on that in a moment. The difference, Mr. Speaker, is precisely this, that here the Congress of the United States acting in its wisdom has absolutely full legislative power to establish just such a form of government as ought to be established, to seek the ideal free from any trammels whatever—to come as near what is exactly the right thing as is possible for the wisdom of this body.

Mr. MAYHAM. But is there not a further objection which the gentleman has not considered? Does not the Constitution of the United States devolve upon Congress the duty to legislate on all matters in reference to this District? Is not all legislation in reference to this District of Columbia intrusted by the Constitution itself in the hands of the Congress of the United States?

Mr. COX, of Ohio. Yes, sir.

Mr. MAYHAM. And is there not in that a difference from the case of the city of New York or the city of New Orleans?

Mr. COX, of Ohio. In only one respect. Nobody pretends that Congress can give a municipal charter to the city of New York, but this body occupies in regard to the city of Washington exactly the position that the Legislature of the State of New York occupies to the city of New York. The State Legislature has by the constitution of the State, which is the fundamental law, the right to legislate in general in such way as it may think wise; and I insist we may do here precisely what the Legislature of the State of New York may do in regard to legislating a charter for that city.

Mr. MAYHAM. But can the Congress of the United States invest the municipality of the city of Washington or the District of Columbia with the legislative power which has been delegated by the Constitution to Congress alone?

Mr. COX, of Ohio. The cases are exactly parallel. If the Constitution of the United States delegates to Congress unlimited legislative power (as the State constitution does to the State Legislature) it gives it power to make such a charter for this municipality as it pleases, provided it comes within the general description of a government republican in form. That is all that is needed. It is precisely because of these reasons that whenever Congress approaches this subject anew, as it is now doing, it is bound to make its action say by strongest implication, "We are offering you our idea of what should be a municipal government for a city with such a mixed population." We are free from great difficulties which would embarrass the Legislature of a State. If you were acting in New York you would have a vast population of the city to which the members of the Legislature would be directly responsible. The ordinary local, political, ambitions and influences would then have full play, and the class which has fattened upon the plunder of the city would resist every effort to diminish its power. Every member of the Legislature who was acting on the question would be there influenced more or less by the question how it would affect his own political standing and his political future. But here, having had the experience we have, the people of the country having acquiesced in this provisional government which was formerly made, and being only anxious to see what the wisdom of Congress can provide as a model government for this city and its suburbs, the field is all open to you. You have nothing but the ordinary problem of giving local government to a city. The limits of the District of Columbia since the Virginia part has been cut off are those only of an ordinary town. When you have included every acre of ground in the District, it does not begin to be as large as the municipal territorial limits of a dozen of the cities of the country. The responsibility for action is, in kind, precisely the same. The question propounded is not simply how you will patch up the difficulties which have grown out of the provisional government, (I will help to do that with all my might,) but how you shall establish with a view to permanence a city government for Washington for which you will be willing to be judged. I insist on it, we shall be held before the country to have declared the utter failure of republican institutions as applied to municipal organizations if we pass at this time such a bill as this. There is no other conclusion which can be reached.

Let us look for a moment at the manner in which the problem has been grappled with elsewhere. They have had an able commission in New York to consider the subject, and the report submitted to the governor is full of instruction and suggestion. Propositions of various minds have been submitted by other investigators of the subject. With American citizens it will always be a desideratum to depart as little as possible from our established principles of popular government and to recognize as fully as possible the right to the elective franchise in the people. In trying to harmonize these principles with the necessary conditions of honest and economical administration the question has been raised whether there should be a limitation to suffrage, and, if so, of what kind? Again, if there is to be such a limitation, whether it shall apply to elections of one or both the usual bodies in the municipal council; whether there shall be a popular body elected by universal suffrage, and another elected by restricted suffrage based on property, based on intelligence or on any other limitation which may tend to keep corrupt rings or mobs from running away with the municipality and plundering it as they please. It is claimed for such a system, as the one last suggested, that by the union of an unrestricted popular voice in one chamber of the council, with the conservative effect of the representation of paid taxes in the other, and the necessary consent of both to all levies of assessments and the expenditure of money, the best expression of both popular enterprise and prudent economy will be reached, and the spirit of our national institutions will be best preserved. It certainly is worthy of careful study and consideration.

Now, here in this District we have full opportunity to do the thing that may be wise. There is no limit upon us whatever except to seek that which is right and prudent. And shall we not be rightly held responsible, as I said, for having determined that popular government is unfit for any municipality when we, after a lapse of so many years, turn the provisional government of the war period into a regular and lasting organization such as this bill provides. Gentlemen on the other side of the Chamber must know that what I say is literally true as they have recently gone through the experience of provisional governments; oftentimes speaking of them in no flattering terms; and they and we both have recognized the truth that the time must come when every such transition period must end. Has the time come when the provisional government for the District of Columbia must cease, and a municipal government according to the Constitution of the United States and the established custom of all the several States, shall be established?

Mr. BUCKNER. Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. COX, of Ohio. Yes, sir.

Mr. BUCKNER. The gentleman speaks of the provisional government as a war measure. Am I correct in so understanding him?

Mr. COX, of Ohio. As a measure resulting from the war; yes.

Mr. BUCKNER. The provisional government was established in 1874, long after the war. The government of the District of Columbia which that set aside was the government originated in the war, and the provisional government was to cure that.

Mr. COX, of Ohio. I am of course as well aware of that as the gentleman from Missouri. But what I said is none the less true that stumbling on with our experiments of this kind, we went from one to another during a period longer possibly than was wise or necessary, but still this act of 1874 was only one of the series, and every one of its characteristics shows that it was merely provisional. I earnestly believe, Mr. Speaker, that there are abundant means by which, in entire accord with safety and with good government, we may do that which this city needs. It is all nonsense for us to pretend we have saved the principle of popular election by a bill like this. It simply makes a farce of it. A recent historian of the French Empire has called attention to the manner in which the first Napoleon by means of imperial decrees, such as he saw fit to make, took away all real power from the legislature while he pretended to leave it in possession of its functions, so that it should become the mere registrar of his decrees and have in fact no power of any sort whatever. The form was saved, but the essence was destroyed. There was the outline of a form of republican government, but the substance, the spirit of it was absolutely gone. We seem to have turned back to imitate those old provisions of the Napoleonic imperialism, and by a singular parody of popular institutions this bill comes as nearly as possible to a reproduction of by-gone forms of despotism, which were deliberately framed for the purpose of cheating the public into the belief that they had republican government when in fact they had nothing but the decrees of an autocratic ruler.

In all this I am as far as possible from intending to argue that it is necessary to return at once and by a single step in the District of Columbia to a government of universal suffrage, controlling the expenditures, the legislation, and the whole local administration of the city. I simply say we have the power and the opportunity both combined to determine here just what may be best; to try just such an experiment as we are willing to say we would have New Orleans or Mobile or New York or Boston follow; that we are willing, and the people of the United States are willing, to limit suffrage in this District, if necessary, just as far as is necessary and just as long as is necessary; and that we may, by a system of gradual approaches to the most popular form of local government, basing our qualification of electors on education or on taxation, soon bring about that condition of things in which we may have a municipality here that shall be a model for similar cities everywhere. It is because this bill seems to me to depart radically from such an idea, because it seems even to turn its back upon municipal governments such as we are accustomed to, that I am convinced we ought not to pass it. I, for one, would not be willing to be responsible for the result, whether it be looked at as a matter of theory or one of practical business.

When we leave general principles and come to look at the details of this bill there are many very astonishing things in it. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BRENTANO] who has just taken his seat has referred to some of them in very proper terms. I agree with him that it is no recommendation to the bill that it provides for detailing an officer of the Army to act as one of the commissioners who are to act as civil governors of the District. I have as much faith, Mr. Speaker, in the officers of the Army as any one, and from long personal association and intimate friendships among them am not likely to underestimate their excellent qualities. I believe, however, that like other men they are mortal and human. I believe they are fallible. I believe that the experience of this District is the one experience of all others to which hostile critics of the Army would refer to prove that an engineer officer of the Army colluding with a contractor may make the very worst condition of things in such a municipality that can possibly exist; such a condition of things that this bill of 1874 might be a necessity to rid the District of it. Therefore it will not do to argue that necessarily the appointment of an Army officer to supervise the local administration is to secure purity. It will generally do so if he is appointed, and if he is employed under the sanction, the restraints, the kind of subordination, the appeal to his honor, to which he is commonly subjected. But when you put him into totally new and untried circumstances, he is all the more likely to fail because he is unaccustomed to civil administration. He is and should remain a military officer as contrasted to a civilian. The considerations which have most weight in his mind are not those which a civilian would give equal importance to. His methods will be different, his ideas of rule and of subordination will be different, his relations to his equals and his inferiors in the civil administration will not and cannot be those demanded by our political life. He would cease to be a soldier if in these respects he should become a political governor. The history of our Army, like that of the whole world, establishes this.

If he is to be simply a civil engineer and surveyor, in supervision of the public improvements of the District, there is no more reason here than in New York why he should be at the head of the city government, instead of being a scientific employé of it.

This bill, then, provides for three commissioners of the District of Columbia, one of whom shall be an officer of the Engineer Corps, who shall be detailed for a term of three years and until his successor shall be appointed and qualified, and who shall be assigned to no other duties during said term. In this there is no provision whatever for removal or for putting an end to the detail. When he has once been appointed he is dictator practically for three years over the affairs of the District. His opinion as to the improvements to be made, the style and cost of sewerage, of paving, of the grades of streets, will all be in practice the law for the city. I think it will be at once apparent to any one who has taken the trouble to run over the newspapers for a month or two past and read the paragraphs going the rounds of them, in which this officer of the Army or the other officer is declared to be in favor of one kind of pavement for the city or another, that contractors are already forecasting the probable appointment, and are mustering a lobby to secure influences for the designation of an officer known to favor the use of patents which they control, and the conflict of rival interests has already begun.

The bill also provides for the election of one commissioner by each House of Congress. I will not spend a moment on this provision of the bill, except to say that I perfectly accord with the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BRENTANO] in the opinion that the election by Congress of such officers is a violation of the Constitution of the United States. The appointing power is not here, and it seems to me like a mere juggle with words to say that the legislative power means the appointing power. The legislative duties are those which pertain to the making and passing of laws, and are as far as possible from the duties which belong to the Executive in the appointment of officers who are to administer the laws.

Then I concur also in the objection which the gentleman from Illinois raises to the long period required for residence in the District of Columbia before a man can be elected a commissioner.

Mr. BLACKBURN. I do not wish to interrupt the train of argument of the gentleman; but I would like, if he has no objection, to ask him a question.

Mr. COX, of Ohio. Certainly; I yield with pleasure.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Seeing that the gentleman is leaving that branch of the discussion, I wanted to ask whether he does not predicate that portion of his argument upon the assumption that the commissioners of the District of Columbia are not municipal officers, but Federal officers? Does he not assume that they are officers of the United States, as in contradistinction to being municipal officers or officers of a corporation?

Mr. COX, of Ohio. I do not know exactly how to answer the question of the gentleman from Kentucky, for this reason: that since these officers are appointed by the Government of the United States, I do not know myself how they can be other than United States officers; for if the Congress of the United States can appoint any officers other than United States officers I am greatly at a loss to know what those officers would be.

Mr. BLACKBURN. The gentleman will remember that the statute of 1807, under which the government of this District went into operation, which has been supplanted by the present form of government, expressly declares that the territory embraced within this District shall hereafter be known as the corporation of the District of Columbia, making it a municipality.

Mr. COX, of Ohio. That is what it ought to be, and that is the thing that we ought to make it by law, although I do not see that we are going to do it by this bill. Our duty is to create, by law, a self-governing municipality, as they are created within the States by State legislation; and we have here an opportunity analogous to that which an agriculturist would have when a model farm is put in his charge. You may and should have a model municipality. You are supposed to have here in Congress the collected wisdom of the country; men who have seen the working of municipalities in all parts of the nation, both North and South, and can compare the advantages and defects of all; and I would be glad to see an effort made in earnest to present to the country the model which the experience of a century of wonderful growth and variety of circumstances would construct.

But what I was going to remark was that the provision making ten years' residence the qualification of a commissioner of the District of Columbia, whatever might have been the intent of the framers of the bill, must be regarded as simply marvelous.

Some of us remember what Washington was ten years ago. It was then only beginning to recover from the effects of the war. Up to that time we might properly call it a petty country town. Within the last ten years nearly every important block of buildings along the avenue has been put up. Within ten years capital from the North has built the great Central market-house, and perhaps others in different parts of the city. Within ten years nearly every prominent building in the city, except the Government buildings, have been built. You may pass through the streets of the city into the north-western section of it, where miles of noble avenues are lined with beautiful residences, or may go eastward on Capitol Hill, and you will find that ten years ago the land on which these solid blocks now stand was open, vacant country lots. Within ten years a city has been built up more beautiful and more regular than any other on the continent of its size. Within ten years the money needed for these improvements has been brought into the District of Columbia by enterprising citizens of other parts of the Union. Everybody knows that it has come from the North. They were northern capitalists who reconstructed and rebuilt this city on the ruins of what it was before. The money for this purpose was not here, and the South, poverty-stricken by the scourge of war, did not possess it. But whether it had come from South or North the anomaly and the wrong would be the same, when those who have rebuilt the town by the liberal expenditure of their wealth are told that everybody who has had any hand in these improvements, everybody who has brought capital here and co-operated in the labor and the cost of making the new Washington, shall be excluded from a seat in its government; that we must go back to the time when it was a dull country town and seek the men who were here then to fill the chief municipal offices to-day. The mere statement of the thing shows the absurdity of it.

Mr. HUNTON. Will the gentlemen allow me to interrupt him for a moment?

Mr. COX, of Ohio. Certainly.

Mr. HUNTON. What I desire to say is in regard to the right of Congress to name the officers to govern this District instead of making them presidential appointments. I desire to call the attention of the gentleman from Ohio to a case that was decided in the State of Pennsylvania:

The constitution of Pennsylvania, in force in 1817, provided "that the governor shall appoint all officers whose offices are established by the constitution or shall be established by law, and whose appointments are not herein otherwise provided for." The court in construing this article of the constitution of that State, in the case of Lieuman vs. Sutherland, (3 Sergeant and Rawle, 149,) used the following language: "The word office is of very vague and indefinite import. Everything concerning the administration of justice, or the general interest of society, may be supposed to be within the meaning of the constitution, especially if fees or emoluments are annexed to the office. But there are matters of temporary and local concern which, although comprehended in the term office, have not been thought to be embraced by the constitution. And when offices of that kind have been created, the Legislature have sometimes made the appointment in the law which created them, sometimes giving the appointment to the governor, and sometimes giving the power of removal to others, although the appointment was left to the governor. The officers of whom I am speaking are often described in acts of Assembly by the name of commissioners—such, for instance, as are employed in laying out roads and canals and other works of a public nature. Yet all these perform a duty, or, in other words, exercise an office. So, likewise, officers within the limit of a corporation are generally appointed by the corporation unless they concern the administration of justice." The opinion from which I have just quoted was delivered by Chief-Justice Tilghman, and concurred in by Gibson and Duncan.

I would say to the gentleman from Ohio that in the Forty-fourth Congress this question of a permanent government for the District of Columbia was submitted to a joint committee of both Houses of Congress, of which I had the honor to be a member. When this question of the appointment of commissioners came up before the joint committee, counsel learned in the law appeared before the committee to argue and determine whether this mode of appointment was constitutional or no. We had the opinions of counsel upon the subject, and the committee came to unanimous conclusion, I believe, (there certainly was only one exception,) that Congress had the right to appoint the commissioners for the District of Columbia in the manner prescribed by this bill. I think if my friend will examine the authorities on the subject he will come to the same conclusion.

Mr. COX, of Ohio. I am not sorry to have the interruption of the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. HUNTON,] although it has perhaps gone rather beyond the limits usually allowed in such cases. The report, which was certainly an ingenious one, made by the committee of which the gentleman was a member, and prepared, as I believe, by himself, has been before me, and I have examined it. Mr. Speaker, I have been too long at the bar not to know that it is often easy to find a piece of special pleading in a judicial decision which will seem to go on all fours with the argument we may wish to make and which may yet be quite contrary to the general current of decisions on the subject and contrary also to sound legal principles and to common sense.

I still insist that, under the Constitution of the United States, the distinction between the legislative power and the appointing power of the Executive has been so fixed, so clearly stated, from the earliest days of the Government to this time, that it would work an absolute revolution to admit the correctness of the principle stated by the gentleman in the report from which he has read. Such a principle would cover all appointments by the President of every kind, from the Pacific to the Atlantic. It would cover the appointment of every officer of a Territory, of every collector of a port, of every revenue officer in the Treasury Department. They might as well be appointed by Congress, under the authority of the case in the State of Pennsylvania which has been read, as the officers of the District of Columbia.

No, sir, the fact remains, and will remain, that the authority of Congress over the District is limited to legislation by the Constitution, which excludes the power of appointing its officers.

But I am using time, Mr. Speaker, (and the gentleman from Virginia is of course partly responsible for it,) which I intended to devote to other things. Let us consider another provision of this bill. In the sixth section of this bill is a provision that no person shall be eligible as a member of the council which is to be established unless he shall have property of the assessed value of $3,000 or more. When we endeavor to ascertain what the duties of this council are we find that they are practically nil. It is to have no legislative power; it cannot pass an ordinance; it cannot make a police regulation; it has simply the power to pass upon appropriations and estimates, approving or rejecting, but neither originating them nor changing their character. It may have the negative power of a veto, if you please, upon expenditures; but what does that amount to in such a council? A council with no legislative powers, with no pay for its services, whose interest it would therefore be to do nothing, unless contractors in whose favor appropriations are submitted by the commissioners could make it for the interest of the members to attend and vote for their approval. To guard against the temptations to corruption thus skillfully offered the property qualification of $3,000 is supposed to be sufficient.

There may be those who think that the property qualification of $3,000 is one which will be sure to bring into such a council men of real character and standing; but I fancy that no gentleman familiar with municipal government or with the value of city property needs to be told that $3,000 would be a very low estimate of the value of any common restaurant, or saloon, or drinking-shop which you may find upon any corner of the streets throughout the city.

Therefore in regard to the class of men which are most commonly held up to view as those whom the citizens should most avoid, those who would be most familiar with the "machine" methods of seeking and obtaining control of your city politics and city improvements, this provision will practically be no exclusion at all; it would be a monstrous absurdity to talk of it as an exclusion.

Do we need to be told that it is easy for irresponsible persons to have property in their names, not paid for, or upon which next to nothing has been paid, covered by mortgages equal to or beyond its value, to the extent of more than $3,000? It seems to me exceeding clear that if this bill shall become a law this part of it would be a mere sham, and you would have all the odium which could attach to a limiting of the rights of citizens to hold office, without a particle of protection. You would probably have a council that would be in the market for every rich contractor who should see fit to buy its votes in favor of his appropriations or would levy black-mail upon those who did not offer to buy them.

It is also proposed—and upon that I shall perhaps spend a few moments by and by—to provide that of the expenditures for the District government a given proportion, say 50 per cent., shall be borne by the United States. Now, while from one point of view there are arguments which make that proposition appear just, there are things implied in it which a moment's consideration would show to work incalculable mischief.

For example, suppose it is thought desirable to enter into contracts for paving V street or Z street, or some other street far out beyond the present boundaries of the city. The people owning property there, who may be interested in having the street paved, will be told that the Government of the United States is to pay for half of the expenditure, and therefore they may just as well have an expensive pavement as any other. It would be said to them, let us have a costly pavement, for it will only cost you as much as the very cheapest would if the Treasury of the United States did not pay half of the expenses. Unfortunately, according to the common history of these things, the council, which seems to be specially planned for such a work, will be easily brought to yield their assent for a consideration. You will have the interest of the locality to make an extravagant expenditure of money, getting their improvements, as they will, at half price, and we shall witness a revel of contractors to which the days of former "rings" and "bosses" will be as nothing, winding up with new disgraceful explosions and new efforts to organize a local government to repeat the same experiences in different form until we return to the sound principles of self-government under proper checks and restraints, and with such limitations upon the power of running into debt as shall force the application of John Randolph's "philosopher's stone"—"pay as you go."

Of course the committee which has presented this bill would deplore as much as any of us such results as I have described; but it seems to me that they would inevitably follow from the adoption of the measure as it stands.

Mr. HUNTON. I am sure my friend does not wish to misstate the provisions of the bill; and if he will allow the interruption—

Mr. COX, of Ohio. Certainly.

Mr. HUNTON. I will say that if the gentleman had read the bill carefully he would have found that the commissioners are to make out an estimate in detail—

Mr. COX, of Ohio. I am perfectly well aware of that.

Mr. HUNTON. And that no street in the city of Washington can be paved or otherwise improved unless that item of appropriation shall pass both Houses of Congress and be signed by the President.

So that at last the matter is left entirely within the control and under the jurisdiction of the Congress of the United States.

Mr. COX, of Ohio. The extent to which the Congress of the United States will give its attention to the minute details involved in these improvements is a thing about which gentleman may, if they please, console themselves with the idea that it will be sufficient. I do not. I find that practically when you have such a government as this the statement will be, "You must trust this local government." There was exactly this same power in Congress in 1874; exactly the same power in 1870 or in 1867. The question is, how far that power was in fact exercised; whether we shall undertake to do the details of the work and thus fill our lobbies with those who have an interest in these matters, or whether we shall content ourselves with the belief that we have a city government which we must trust and thus will turn over to it all such questions? I am not deceived, I think, in believing that the alternative will be this: either we must do all the details of the work with the lobby filled with contractors clamoring for contracts, or we must turn the matter over to the city government. I assume that the latter will be done as being the natural, indeed the only practicable thing to do.

We have, then, the provision that no person holding any office under the United States or the District of Columbia shall be eligible as a member of the council. Why exclude those persons who are here in the Departments? They are respectable men and they have an interest in the welfare of the city. Many of them are among the most permanent of its citizens.

We next come to the qualifications of those who may vote for councilmen. It is provided that the voter shall have been an actual bona fide resident of said District of Columbia for the three years and of the election precinct in which he offers to vote for the six months last preceding the election at which he offers to vote, claiming no residence elsewhere during that time, and who shall have paid the poll tax imposed upon him by law.

Whether this limitation will exclude those whom you wish to exclude is a question about which I think we may rationally have very great doubts. The bill provides for a residence of three years; but many of the class that you will most seek to avoid as voters in the District are those who have been here for more than three years. My own opinion is that in this District, as in the States generally, the true theory of the limitation as to the term of residence necessary to qualify a person for the use of the elective franchise is naturally and only that of time enough to prove his bona fide intention to remain as a resident. For example, in the State of Ohio we say that any citizen of the United States who may have been in the State a year shall have the right to vote. Why a year? Simply because, in making a change of abode from one portion of the country to another a period like this seems to be a sufficient guarantee that the residence is not merely temporary; that the person does not come merely to work through harvest and then go away again; that he comes to reside. When he has remained more than a year he has the right to act as a citizen of the State of Ohio in the exercise of the elective franchise. On the same principle we proceed in regard to changes of residence within the State itself, where the shifting of population is more rapid and less stringent tests of bona fide residence are necessary. In changing from one county to another, or from one city to another, we require only a month's residence, and as to changes from one ward to another, only ten days; thus reducing the period in order to accommodate it to those smaller changes of abode which are constantly occurring in our population. The intent is simply to test the residence. The right resides in the citizen as a citizen. It is by virtue of his being a citizen of the whole United States that he has the right within a State to exercise local citizenship, after removing to it from another State. I insist that this is a wise rule, and the only wise rule. Here is no question of the naturalization of foreigners; it is only the exercise of the right of locomotion by citizens of the United States, to whom the Constitution guarantees the right of citizenship in each and all of the States, and a fortiori in the Territories and Districts over which the United States may have unqualified control.

But of all limitations that of residence is the least reliable for any such purposes as that for which, in this case, you desire to use it. If you will make a limitation based upon education or upon property by the requirement of payment of a certain amount of tax, you adopt a test to which all resident may be alike subjected, and can thus sift out the population that you intend shall be the voting constituency of the District. Such a plan will be at least intelligible, and would no doubt tend to correct many of the evils which led originally to taking the government entirely out of the hands of the people. It would certainly be a much nearer approach to a useful discrimination as to the right to vote than the test of mere length of residence.

But lest I should weary the House, I will notice only one or two points more. I am informed that in the bill as printed the provision for the organization of the commission is somewhat different from that which the committee have determined finally to present to the House. The provision as it stands in the bill is that—

All contracts for the construction, improvement, alteration, or repairs of the streets, avenues, highways, alleys, gutters, sewers, and all work of like nature shall be made and entered into only by and with the official consent of a majority of the commissioners of the District, of which majority—

I beg the House will give its attention to this—of which majority the commissioner appointed from the Engineer Corps of the Army shall be one. And the entire control and supervision of the execution and fulfillment of all contracts entered into, and the preparation of all plans, specifications, and estimates for work as above mentioned, shall be vested in and exercised by that commissioner of the District of Columbia appointed from the Engineer Corps of the Army, as hereinbefore provided.

Now I am told that in the amendment proposed (if I am wrong the gentleman from Vermont, I trust, will correct me) it is intended to require the unanimous agreement of the commissioners. I wish simply to say that in my judgment this does not alter the objectionable character of this provision; for it will be observed the entire control and supervision of the execution and fulfillment of the contracts is in the engineer officer.

Mr. HENDEE. That is stricken out.

Mr. COX, of Ohio. How is it as to the provision that "the preparation of all plans, specifications, and estimates shall be vested in and exercised by that commissioner appointed from the Engineer Corps?"

Mr. HENDEE. That is retained.

Mr. COX, of Ohio. Let us see, then, how it will stand. The engineer commissioner will be the only one who by law can make estimates of plans; the only one, therefore, who can submit them. If he chooses to say, "I will not estimate for this street or avenue; I will not make a plan for that sewer or improvement," the other members of the commission are absolutely powerless. They may present that which he makes estimates or plans for; nothing else shall they think of; nothing else shall go to the council for their approval.

Now, what is the result? If you must have the unanimity required you leave it in the power of this one commissioner to say, "Nothing shall be done except as I will. I make your plans; I make your estimates. If I say that I dissent from you you can do nothing." The other two may stand as they please. "You have to do what I wish or nothing can be done." The engineer officer can say, "You shall do it or you cannot budge one inch." If that is what you call a government of three, it strikes me we will have to go to France again for its likeness, and seek its prototype under the First Consul when he had two colleagues who shared the power with him nominally under the law, but only in name, for Napoleon Bonaparte was the first and last and only real government. And he was, if not an engineer officer, an officer of the artillery and ordnance, which is the next thing to it.

We have also a provision that no member of the council shall receive anything for his services, which I must insist is only enlarging the temptation to accord with the estimates which may be made, and to grant just such appropriations as are asked, only as contractors and others may make it for their interest to do so.

The assumption that the council may be expected to be made up of pure men only is entirely gratuitous. If that were sure to be so, we ought to give them the whole power at once. Mr. Speaker, the more carefully we consider this bill the more thoroughly I think we shall find that if we should adopt it we shall be drifting away from everything that we have hitherto marked in this country as the insignia of real popular government and from that which we have regarded as the proper type of municipal government. Grant that evils have originated in nearly all our city governments; grant the necessity for reform—I not only grant it, I insist on it—but we still have to face the question, "How we are going to govern consistently with the general exercise of the elective franchise?"

Here in this city of Washington you have your model farm, to use the simile I have before applied, and if we cannot, now that we are attempting to make a thorough revision of the organic law of the District, provide something that approaches nearer to popular government than this we had better give it up. We can still remove some of the present inconsistencies and anomalies. We can put the board of health and the municipal police under the control of the existing commissioners, as they are now appointed. We can thus take away many of the practical obstructions to responsible administration now found to exist. We can then run on till we are ready with a better plan of government; and I must repeat it, we shall not in my opinion do our duty, if we undertake at any time a thorough revision of the government of the District of Columbia without grappling squarely with this question: "What ought to be the municipal government for a city of some two hundred thousand inhabitants made up of the mixed population we have here?" Such a government the citizens of Washington have a right to. The fact that Congress may, if it will, play the petty part of a city council, does not make it either necessary or right to do so. The fact that it may, if it will, disfranchise the people, is no justification for doing so. They have an inalienable right to the freest, the most popular form of municipal organization which is compatible with the safety of life and property, with the preservation of good order, and the security of the national property which is here. For us to give them less, will be to be false to the most fundamental principles of American liberty.

Mr. CLAFLIN. Mr. Speaker, the committee in approaching the consideration of this bill was I believe actuated by a desire to give to this city and the District of Columbia a non-partisan government, and in pursuit of that object it has labored during the past four months. This bill was brought before the committee by the gentleman from Vermont, [Mr. HENDEE,] who, in conjunction with the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. HUNTON,] had been considering it for the last two years.

Why should this bill be brought into the House at this time? In 1874, Congress in a moment of desperation, owing to the ill condition of affairs in the District, struck down its then existing government and placed the administration of its affairs in the hands of a commission. It also instituted a board of audit, consisting of two high officers of the Treasury Department, with the power to audit all claims against the District of Columbia and to issue certificates for those claims exchangeable in 3.65 District bonds.

After two years' experience it was found that this board of audit was going on at a reckless rate and in a moment of desperation Congress checked its operation, stopped appropriations for the improvement of the District, and imposed a penalty upon the commissioners in case they attempted to increase the debt of the District; yes, Mr. Speaker, imposed a fine of $10,000 and imprisonment for one or more years if they increased the debt of the District one dollar. All these years the people of the District have expected some permanent form of government to be established. But nothing has been done, and why? Simply from the inherent difficulty of making any improvement in the situation of affairs in the present condition of things. By the Constitution the affairs of this District are placed exclusively in the hands of Congress just as a fort or any public improvement belonging to the United States, and it is for that reason Congress came forward, and by a commission took the power from the hands of the people and establishes this temporary form of government until a better one can be substituted.

The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. Cox] finds fault with the form of the commission. He says we should take great pains to establish a form of civic government here which should be a model for the whole United States. Where is there another piece of land in the United States that is situated as the District of Columbia is? Where have we another territory that is exclusively in the hands of Congress? Why is it in the hands of Congress? Simply because it belongs to the United States as its capital; the same as the land of a fort belongs to the United States for the purposes of a fort. No other city in the United States is in any such condition. After so long experience it is thought best that the commission, or something like the commission, should stand as the motive or as the executive power in the District. No other plan has ever yet been broached which is acceptable to Congress. The gentleman from Ohio himself who criticizes this bill so fully does not place before you any form of government. He only says we should get up some sort of a municipal government; which is a self-evident fact, surely, long since patent. This incorporated in our bill is the best the committee can establish for the present time, and worthy of the fullest consideration.

The first thing that the bill does is to take away from the various heads of Departments in the District of Columbia the power which they now possess and place it in the hands of the commissioners. You certainly should have some head in the District. There is none now. Here are five or six boards, acting independently of each other, coming to Congress for increase of power, coming to Congress for money, doing these things without responsibility to any one; appointing their men and discharging them without any accountability except that in an indefinite way the House may give them attention for half an hour some odd morning.

Now the first thing that strikes the eye of any one in considering this matter is the want of responsibility of this commission. You cannot have it here in Congress. You cannot take time to consider the details of the affairs of this District. They will be running to waste constantly. The people have no idea of what is going on in a secret commission, as all these things are done necessarily in secret by three persons. There is no way of having any curtailment of their desires or their plans. The committee then thought it was better to substitute a council. The gentleman from Vermont [Mr. Hendee] dislikes the council because it savors of the old board, he says, in which there were twenty-four men. Now there are twenty-four men in almost every Territory of the United States acting as the council. That is the usual number and it is very convenient. By this bill the council is elected for two years, one-half one year, and the other half next year, thus giving a continuous body of experienced men.

On the one side they say this council has no power. It seems to me it has a great deal of power. Not a dollar of tax can be laid without the consent of this council. Not a dollar of money can be raised without its consent. No man can be appointed under the bill to an office of which the salary is over $1,500 without the concurrence of this council. Every contract for repairs of streets, lanes, avenues, alleys, and for public buildings—every item of expense must come before this council before a dollar can be expended.

It seems to me that is considerable power. I can assure this House if there had been any such power as that in the old board of public works there would not have been a debt of $25,000,000 saddled upon this little community to-day, made by the authority of Congress; made by a board of public works, which was in effect responsible to nobody; appointed by the President, it is true, but in reality responsible to nobody. They had the whole care of the streets and alleys and avenues of the city and of the District buildings; and after they had once run the District in debt, that debt must be paid through the action of Congress, as we have found to our cost.

That is the power of the council in the negative form. We have substituted the board of commission for the council as the usual motive power. In cities the council commonly initiates taxes and plans public works. We simply reverse that. We place the power in the hands of the commission. Why? Because the United States must pay one-half the expenses of this District or the people here must repudiate. And if Congress or the country pays one-half the expenses they certainly should keep a very sharp lookout as to how those expenses are incurred.

Some of the details of the bill have been referred to, especially the length of residence in the District, that proposed being longer, I think, than in any other city or State in the Union. This bill is a compromise. Some of the gentlemen on the committee wished to have five years; some wished to have one; some wished to have three. In all small communities it has been found necessary to limit the residence more closely than they do in large ones. The good State of Rhode Island, which is so small in territory that people run into it very easily from surrounding States, has fixed the term of citizenship two years. Here is a District into which people can run from Maryland and Virginia and nominally settle and nobody knows them. They may be here in a corner of an adjoining State, just over the line of the District, and no one knows but that they have a residence in it. It was thought that if a residence of three years was required it would be easily ascertained whether people were residents here or not. It was also thought essential and fitting that known residents should administer the affairs of the District, and for that reason a term of three years was placed in the bill. I care not what the term is: three or two or one years. Three, perhaps, will answer the purpose best. The great thing is to give the people the power by vote to stop the expenditures, to regulate their affairs, to take care of their schools, their streets, their highways. They have no such power now. In the whole Union there is not a place with a population of one hundred and fifty thousand where the people are not allowed to vote.

Gentlemen think that the right to vote provided for in this bill does not go far enough. Let us begin by adopting this form of government, and if we find it imperfect it can very easily be changed; but unless we begin we shall never have a government here that is acceptable to the people of the District or to the people of the country.

Mr. Speaker, I will not go into the details of the bill, because when we come to consider it under the five-minute rule they can be discussed; but I will simply say that the great purpose of the committee was to establish here a commission that should be non-partisan and to enable the people by their votes to stop unnecessary expenditures and to watch over their affairs; and another object of the committee was to establish at some rate or other the proportion the United States Government shall pay toward the expenses of the government of the District and what proportion the people of the District shall pay.

Now, practically for the last four or five years the people of the District have paid one-half of the expenses of its running expenses, but of course they never know whether they are expected to pay one-half or the whole. It is impossible for the people to pay the whole, for it would make a tax from 4 to 5 per cent. on all the property in the District and would lead to the creation of a debt which the people of the District would in the end have to repudiate.

Virginia stands to-day considering whether it will pay its public debt, which only amounts to $30,000,000, while the people of this District are already saddled with a debt of $25,000,000. I wish I could say positively that that amount would cover the whole debt. I fear not, but I think that Congress should establish what proportion it would pay for the government of the District, or everlasting disgrace must come upon it.

Gentlemen may say possibly "we can make the appropriation from year to year," but nobody will then know whether the appropriation will be made or not. It should be one of the fixed appropriations so as to enable the people of the District to regulate their affairs accordingly.

I know that it is the desire of the House to consider the bill by sections, therefore I will no longer occupy its time upon the question of its merits as a whole.

Mr. LATHROP. Before the gentleman takes his seat I desire to ask him one question. I should like to know if it is the purpose of the committee by this bill to abolish the municipal corporation of the District of Columbia?

Mr. CLAFLIN. There is none; there is only a commission composed of three men.

Mr. LATHROP. When was the municipal corporation abolished?

Mr. CLAFLIN. In 1874.

Mr. LATHROP. Then there is no municipal corporation here now?

Mr. CLAFLIN. There is none; there was a municipal corporation from 1802 to 1874.

Mr. LATHROP. Then do I understand the gentleman as saying that the committee have recommended a mere private corporation for the government of this District?

Mr. CLAFLIN. It is not private.

Mr. LATHROP. It must be either private or municipal. I understood the gentleman to say that it was the purpose of the committee to abolish the municipal corporation.

Mr. CLAFLIN. No, I said it was the object of the committee to abolish the present temporary government and establish the municipal government, in which the United States is one party and the people of the District another.

Mr. LATHROP. Does the gentleman know of any precedent for creating the corporation for the government of a municipal body separate in existence, as is proposed in the third section of the bill?

Mr. CLAFLIN. I know of no other community situated as this one is.

Mr. LATHROP. Then this is to try an experiment in government?

Mr. CLAFLIN. It is not an experiment, because it has been tried here for seventy years practically. This district was governed by a municipal council, the lower body of which was elected by the people, the upper body, the aldermen, were appointed by the President.

Mr. LATHROP. Pardon me a moment. I find that section 2 of the revised statutes for the District of Columbia reads as follows:

The District is created a government by the name of the District of Columbia, by which name it is constituted a body corporate for municipal purposes, and may contract and be contracted with, sue and be sued, plead and be impleaded, have a seal, and exercise all other powers of a municipal corporation not inconsistent with the Constitution and laws of the United States and the provisions of this title.

Now, I submit that that language is entirely omitted in this bill and this provision is substituted:

SEC. 3. That the said commissioners of the District of Columbia shall be, and they are hereby, constituted a body corporate, by the name of "The Commissioners of the District of Columbia," and by that name shall have perpetual succession, and be capable in law to sue and be sued in any court whatsoever, and may have and use a common seal, which may be altered at pleasure; may acquire, rent, hold and property; may contract and be contracted with, (in all cases authorized by law) and may in appropriate ways, in court and elsewhere, consistent with this act, assert, defend, and maintain its rights and interests to the same extent that it would be lawful if the said commissioners of the District of Columbia were a municipality.

Is it the purpose of the committee to abolish the corporation of the District of Columbia and substitute three commissioners?

Mr. CLAFLIN. Three commissioners and a council.

Mr. LATHROP. Can you tell me whether the council so created are officers of the last corporation or officers of some other institution?

Mr. CLAFLIN. They are officers of the corporation which is created by this act.

Mr. BUTLER. The bill making them capable of suing and being sued like any other corporation.

Mr. HENDEE. I desire some arrangement for fixing the time to close general debate on this bill. I understand that there are two or three gentlemen who desire to speak, but for how long a time I am not aware. Unless there is objection, I would propose that general debate be closed in one hour from this time.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. I desire to reserve to myself the right to speak for perhaps thirty minutes.

Mr. RAINEY. I object to any limit for general debate being now made; this is a very important bill and should be fully discussed.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The remedy is with the House at any time. The gentleman from Vermont [Mr. HENDEE] will be recognized by the Chair at any time to submit a proposition to the House for limiting general debate upon this bill.

Mr. HENDEE. I will not ask for any limit now, but will allow the general debate to run a while longer.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. TOWNSEND] is recognized and entitled to the floor.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of Illinois. I desire to say something in reference to some of the features of this bill; but at the request of the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. WILSON] I have agreed to yield, in order that he may bring up a bill pending here in regard to the distribution of the Mexican award fund.

Mr. HENDEE. The gentleman from West Virginia advised me that he would not ask to have his bill taken up at this time.

Mr. CARLISLE. The bill is in Committee of the Whole anyway.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of Illinois. If the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. WILSON] does not desire the floor at this time for that purpose, I will proceed to say something in regard to some of the features of this bill.

There are some things in this bill upon which I have not yet received sufficient information to warrant me in coming to the conclusion that I ought to cast my vote in its favor without material amendment. When I review the past history of the District of Columbia, when I remember the charges that have been made, and well supported by testimony, of the corruption that has been found in the creation of the debt which now rests upon this District, I hesitate to record my vote in favor of that section of this bill which proposes to make that debt a permanent obligation upon the Federal Government. The section to which I refer is number 8 of this bill.

We are called upon to provide by that section a permanent appropriation for the payment of the annual interest on this debt without opportunity on the part of this House to ascertain whether that debt has been properly or improperly created. I have been left to my own industry in looking into former reports made to this House, for no report accompanies this bill, to ascertain whether the debt is of such a character as should be fixed upon the National Treasury. Limited as my time has been, my investigation has caused me to hesitate, and has determined me to withhold my vote from sanctioning that section of this bill.

It has been said by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. CLAFLIN] and also by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. COX] that this debt will exceed perhaps $25,000,000. When we come to look into the past history of this District, to its population and the taxation imposed upon it, there are reasons which should cause any prudent man to hesitate before fixing upon the National Government and our constituents a debt of this magnitude, created by the method and in the manner to which it owes its origin.

We know that during the past few years there has been a prodigality, an extravagance in the creation of municipal debts in this country which is unparalleled in the history of the world. But I challenge any one to show me the record of any city in the Union which will exhibit so rapid an increase of its debt as is shown in the history of the city of Washington since 1860.

We are sometimes startled by the amount and the character of the debt of the city of Chicago; of the debt of the city of Saint Louis; we are appalled at times by the figures presented in regard to the debt of the city of New York; but if gentlemen will look at the figures of those cities and compare them with their population and the wants and needs of those cities they will find that the debt of the city of Washington is far in excess of the debt of any other city in the Union.

It has been said at times that we should seek to establish here a model municipality, a model city government, in order that other cities of the Union may pattern after it. Sir, if the government of the city of Washington is to be regarded as a pattern for other American cities, then those who live in those cities may well shudder at the future before them if the attempt is made to imitate it.

In a lecture read recently by Mr. Robert P. Porter, of Chicago, before the American social science congress at Boston, I have found some important figures in regard to municipal indebtedness and taxation, which show the marvelous rapidity with which they have accumulated within the last few years in one hundred and thirty American cities. The totals are as follows:

	1876.	1866.
Municipal debt of 130 cities.....	$644,378,663	$221,312,009
Assessed value of property of the same.....	$6,175,092,158	$3,451,619,381
Annual taxation of same.....	$112,711,275	$64,060,098
Population of the same.....	8,576,249	5,919,914

From this it appears that the debt of one hundred and thirty cities of the United States is upward of $644,000,000, and that the debt has increased during the last decennial period from $221,312,009 in 1866 to $644,378,663 at the close of the year 1876, showing a total increase of upward of $420,000,000 and an annual increase of $42,000,000.

I will give a statement of the total debt and population, with the amount per capita, of three of the principal cities of this country:

New York:
Population.....	1,249,668
Debt, about.....	$149,000,000
Amount per capita	$121
Boston:
Population.....	341,109
Debt.....	$42,000,000
Amount per capita	$120
Philadelphia:
Population.....	860,000
Debt.....	$66,000,000
Amount per capita	$76

Now look at the condition of this District and you will find a much more startling array of figures:

The population, estimated, about.....	150,000
Debt, about.....	$25,000,000
Amount per capita	$150

The three cities first named have much larger valuation of property for assessment and a larger tax-paying population than can be found here.

If we compare the increase of population in the District to the increase of taxation, we will find the ratio of increase of taxation to the population much greater than elsewhere. The population of this District in 1860 was 75,080. In 1870, according to the census returns, the population of the District was 131,700. During those ten years the increase of population was 56,660, or an increase of 57 per cent.

In 1860 the annual taxation levied in the District of Columbia was $260,218. In 1870, according to reports which I have been able to find, the annual taxation of the city of Washington was $1,581,569; an increase per annum over that of 1860 of $1,321,351. As I have already said, the increase of population during that time was 57 per cent.; but the increase of taxation was over 700 per cent.; and the amount of taxes in the District has since 1870 swollen to the sum of $3,000,000 per annum.

Now, these are facts which it seems to me should at least arrest the attention of members of this House when they come to determine whether we should provide for imposing an annual taxation of $3,000,000 upon the people of this District and the General Government, as required in the estimates submitted to us by the District commissioners.

I desire now to look a step further into this District debt. I was not here when the board of public works was in authority, therefore I am not so familiar as many members here with its well-doing and its misdoing; but in looking over the report made by an investigating committee of this House, I have been able to gather a few facts that I wish to present in order that the House may have a specimen of some of the items that go to make up this debt which has been fastened upon the District, and which the eighth section of this bill will fasten as a permanent obligation upon the General Government.

In 1872 the board of public works presented to the President of the United States a report, which he sent to Congress, accompanied with the statement, (in order not to occupy too much time I will particularize only as to one street,) there was required for the purpose of improving New York avenue from Ninth street to Fifteenth street, a distance of only six blocks, the sum of $121,471.84. This was the sum fixed upon by the board of public works, and the sum which the President declared was necessary for the completion of that work. The same report contained a tabulated statement of the cost of improvement on this street; and although in the body of the report the sum required for New York avenue was stated at $121,471.84, yet in the tabulated statement it appeared that the amount required for this purpose was $123,552.26.

The table found on pages 247 and 248 of the report to the Forty-second Congress, was as follows:

General fund	$67,219 74
Private property	33,609 87
To other streets	5,568 80
Street railways	2,214 40
To United States five-sixes	14,939 45
Total	123,552 26

I do not refer to this discrepancy in order to dwell upon a difference of two or three thousand dollars in the figures. I merely call attention to it for the purpose of showing what the board of public works and the President said it was necessary for the Government of the United States to pay toward this improvement. In that table I find that the United States Government is charged with the sum of $14,939 which the board of public works said was all that was needed or required from the Government under the law, the balance of the cost being apportioned upon property abutting on the street, or upon the general fund, or from the tax-payers of the District at large, &c.

Now, Mr. Speaker, in an investigation which afterward took place, of which Senator ALLISON was chairman, the officers and employees of the board of public works were brought before the committee and were examined on oath. I have here the figures which Mr. Oertley, the engineer of the District, swore were the amounts charged against the Federal Government; in which investigation he stated that the sum charged against the Federal Government and collected for this improvement on the same six blocks of New York avenue was $83,187.02. At another time the same Mr. Oertley, the engineer of the board of public works, states in his sworn testimony, on page 2293 of the report, that there had been collected from the Federal Government for the improvement of these six blocks on New York avenue the sum of $99,028.85. Although these parties made three different statements of the cost of this particular work, yet it will be seen that there was charged against the Federal Government and collected from the National Treasury $84,088.90 more than the board of public works in their official report, sent to Congress under the sanction of the President of the United States, declared was required to be paid by the Government for this improvement. It also appears that the board charged and collected from the owners of private property abutting on the street and from the General Government, &c., $19,000 more than the entire cost of the improvement, and in addition thereto the sum of $67,219.74 was charged to the general fund and is embraced in the funded 3.65 bonds. Thus the board of public works received in all $207,640.42 for an improvement which only cost, according to its own report, $123,552.26. What became of the excess collected over and above the cost of the work?

Having collected from the General Government and private citizens, &c., they proceeded and did file against the general fund of this District a claim for this improvement of over $67,000, which has been funded into 3.65 bonds. These are the figures in regard to a portion of a single street in this city; and it is a sample of the charges for improvement on many if not all the other streets.

Facts like these have caused me to rise in my seat and protest against the passage of this bill containing the section to which I refer, until some satisfactory explanations are made in this House. Persons familiar with the facts in regard to these matters will tell you that a very large part of the amount funded into the 3.65 bonds is a fraud upon the tax-payers of the District, and that if we pledge the National Government to the payment of the sum already funded, we will fasten a fraudulent debt upon the National Treasury to the extent of the amount included in these 3.65 bonds.

I do not intend to take up time in arguing this question further than to say that in my judgment until there has been such an investigation as will ascertain what is the honest, true, and just debt of the city of Washington, we should not fasten the debt as a permanent obligation on the General Government. I am not, however, opposed to fixing an equitable and fair proportion of taxation to be paid by the General Government. I am not able to say at this time what is a fair proportion.

Sometimes I hear persons residing here, and sometimes persons from abroad, say that notwithstanding the misdoings and frauds of the board of public works, they have given us one of the best paved cities in the Union; that they have made Washington one of the most beautiful cities in the world. I say to you, Mr. Speaker, if I were a taxpayer of Washington, I should much prefer to have the old cobblestone streets and the old grades of Washington as in 1860, when but $260,000 were required to support the municipal government, than to have as now fastened upon this city a debt of $25,000,000, requiring an appropriation of $3,000,000 per annum to pay the interest on it and to carry on the city government.

Now in regard to the manner in which the commissioners of the city are selected I wish to say that I agree with my colleague [Mr. BRENTANO] that if we sanction the first section of this bill we will in effect subvert one of the most familiar and favorite principles upon which our Government is founded, that is, the principle that the military power shall be subordinated to the civil. What does this section do? It utterly and completely subordinates the civil to the military power in this municipal government. Here are three commissioners to be created for the purpose of performing mere civil duties, and yet this bill virtually makes an engineer of the Army the dictator in this District of Columbia. So far as contracts for improvements, &c., are concerned, section 6 provides that all contracts, &c., shall be made and entered into only by and with the official consent of a majority of the commissioners of the District, of which majority the officer appointed from the Engineer Corps shall be one. I have not yet, sir, become convinced that there are no honest men save those who are in the military service of the Government. I am willing to grant there are as many honest men in proportion to numbers in the military department as may be found elsewhere. Perhaps temptation to become corrupt is not so great as in some other departments, as they do not have very extensive control over the collection or disbursement of public funds. I believe three honest men may be found in the District of Columbia familiar with its wants and affairs who may be able to administer the duties assigned these commissioners without calling in the aid of those who belong to the engineer department of the Government.

I believe, Mr. Speaker, a better method can be provided for selecting those officers. The Constitution has granted to Congress the exclusive right of legislating for this District. Unlike that of any municipality in the Union, we find the Constitution has made Congress the legislative body for the District. If Congress is the sole legislative body chosen for the District of Columbia, and it is made its duty to legislate for this city, I hold that Congress has no right to delegate that power to three commissioners or to the council provided in this bill or any other body. When the seat of Government was established in this District, those who entered into the contract originally made, whereby, in consideration of the location of the capital here, they conceded to the General Government certain portions of property, and all those who then resided in the territorial limits of the District yielded to the Federal Government all legislative and municipal power provided in the Constitution. In other words, they accepted their citizenship here on the conditions provided in the Constitution that the American Congress should exercise exclusive legislation in all cases over the District. They had no common council at that day, no board of aldermen; they had no mayor. Congress, in the beginning of its assumption of control in this District, through its committee, exercised all the functions of legislative and municipal control in this city.

The District of Columbia has a grander governing body than any municipality in the Union. The whole American Congress forms its common council. It is true, sir, coming here with the multifarious affairs that each of us have to attend to, we make but poor councilmen for the District. We do not fully understand or appreciate its wants, and perhaps could not legislate as wisely in its affairs as some of the citizens of this District. But the duty has been placed upon our shoulders as the sole and exclusive governing power in the District.

I will not now stop to inquire the reasons for thus placing the District under the supreme, continual, and exclusive control of Congress. At the very beginning of the Government a mob in the city of Philadelphia had given Congress such annoyance that it was compelled to take refuge in the State of New Jersey in order that the councils of the nation might be held in safety and peace. This, perhaps, had much to do in determining that for the future the seat of government should be under the exclusive control of the Federal Government. But I will not dwell further here. I am convinced Congress has the power to appoint officers and legislate for the District of Columbia or provide any sort of government that in its wisdom it may consider proper. There is nothing in the Constitution, in my judgment, which prohibits or prevents Congress from exercising the power to appoint officers for the District.

Congress has the right not only to choose one or two, but the entire number of such commissioners as it may provide for the District of Columbia. And believing that, I feel it would be better for the people here that we should secure as such officers men as free from political bias as can be found, or give both parties a voice in the government of the District. If you leave it to a democratic House to choose them, it will be said they will only choose democrats to fill these positions. If you leave it to the Senate, it will be said that the Senate while a republican body will only choose republicans for that position. If you leave it to the President, he will be governed by his political feeling in the selection of those who shall compose the board of commissioners.

Now, I wish to call the attention of the House to a provision introduced into the constitution of the State of Illinois, which is the most effectual means of giving the minority a voice in the representation of the people as well as the majority. I refer to minority representation by means of cumulative system of voting. The most ready illustration I can give of it is this: in each of our legislative districts there are three members of the Legislature to be chosen. When the voter goes to the polls he has the privilege of casting a ballot for each of the candidates to fill these positions or he has it in his power to divide his three votes equally between any two candidates, or he has it in his power to mass all his votes upon one single individual as a representative of that legislative district in the State Legislature. What is the result of it? In a district where the republican party is in the minority the republicans of that legislative district concentrate their votes upon the republican candidate for the Legislature, and by that means secure at least one representative in the State Legislature; whereas under the old system, the district being a democratic district would only be represented by democratic members of the Legislature. The democrats of the district being in the majority, and knowing that they have not strength enough to elect three members of the Legislature, concentrate their votes perhaps upon two members of the Legislature, and the district is consequently represented by two democrats, as representatives of the majority of the voters of the district, and one republican, representing the minority of the district.

I would introduce that feature here in choosing commissioners for the District of Columbia, bring the two Houses of Congress into joint convention and let these three commissioners be chosen by the two Houses of Congress in joint convention. By that means whatever party is in the minority here will have power to choose a representative in the board of commissioners of the District of Columbia, and the party which happens to be in the majority will have a majority in that board. I am impelled to advocate this for the reason that during the time that the board of public works was rioting here in corruption and in fraud—when, sir, they were forming a mortgage upon the property of the District of Columbia which was appalling to every honest tax-payer here—it has been said if it had not been for the fact that but one party had control of the Government of the District the fate of the city would have been otherwise than what we find it. In other words it is said that if both parties had been represented in the board of public works at the time of the creation of this debt the frauds which took place would not have occurred. I do not undertake to say, sir, that all the honest men are found in one political party or in the other. My experience and observation has taught me that there are dishonest men in all political parties as there are hypocrites in all churches; but there is more probability of honest and economical administration when both parties have a voice in the government.

I would provide a way by which at least the voice of both political parties may be represented in the board which performs the important duty of making contracts and forming the estimates for taxation.

I do not like, Mr. Speaker, to antagonize this bill coming as I find it does from a committee composed of gentlemen of such eminent ability and integrity; it is an unpleasant task to antagonize a bill that comes from their hands, and after careful deliberation receives their sanction; but I felt it to be my duty, as a Representative, to give my views upon these two sections of the bill. There are other features of the bill which I desire to discuss; but I will not occupy the time of the House further this evening.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York, obtained the floor.

Mr. HENDEE. If the gentleman from New York [Mr. TOWNSEND] will yield to me, I will move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. I will yield for that purpose.

LEAVES OF ABSENCE.

Leaves of absence were granted in the following cases:

Mr. HENDEE. I now move that the House adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at four o'clock and thirty-five minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

WILLIAM BATTERSBY.

Mr. FRYE, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported, as a substitute for House bill No. 2083, a bill (H. R. No. 4134) for the relief of William Battersby; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

SCHOONER DON PEDRO.

Mr. FRYE also, from the same committee, reported back, with a favorable recommendation, the bill (H. R. No. 2518) granting jurisdiction and authority to the Court of Claims in the case of the schooner Don Pedro; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

AWARDS OF COMMISSIONERS OF CLAIMS.

Mr. EDEN. I am instructed by the Committee on War Claims to report back, with sundry amendments, House bill No. 3548, making appropriations for the payment of claims reported allowed by the commissioners of claims under the act of Congress of March 3, 1871. If gentlemen desire to reserve points of order upon this bill, I would be glad to be allowed to make a brief explanation of the bill; and then if there is no objection I will ask that the bill be put upon its passage.

The bill the title of which has just been read makes an appropriation for the payment of the claims that have been awarded by the commissioners of claims. It does not embrace any item of appropriation whatever except for a claim upon which the commissioners of claims have acted favorably. In no single case is there any increase of the amount awarded by the commissioners and in some cases there is a slight diminution.

It has been usual to pass bills of this character without requiring them to go to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, for the reason that all the claims incorporated in these bills have been carefully considered by the commissioners of claims and have received careful consideration from the Committee on War Claims of this House, and in this case that committee unanimously recommends the passage of this bill. Should this bill go to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, I apprehend that there is no gentleman on the floor, not connected with the Committee on War Claims, who would have the time or the inclination to make any investigation in reference to the claims. And as the bill after it passes this House must necessarily go to the Senate for consideration there, it is important that it should be passed here as early as possible.

This bill simply carries out the law approved March 3, 1871, under which three commissioners were appointed by the President, with the approval of the Senate, who have jurisdiction to hear claims of loyal citizens of the South for supplies taken by or furnished to the Government during the war. The bill embraces no claims except those of citizens in the South who have been found loyal by these commissioners of claims.

Unless some gentleman wishes to ask some question on this subject, I do not deem it necessary to make any further explanation.

Mr. JONES, of Ohio. I wish to ask whether or not all these claims to which the bill refers were not barred by statute of limitations passed by Congress in 1873.

Mr. EDEN. No one of these claims has been barred by any statute of limitations. The law of 1871 organizing this commission and under which these claims have been adjudicated limited the time for filing claims to two years, which time expired March 3, 1873; but every one of these claims was filed within the time limited by law. Consequently there is no statute of limitations affecting any one of them.

Mr. JONES, of Ohio. These were all filed prior to 1873?

Mr. EDEN. Every claim. The commissioners do not report any claim unless it was filed within the time prescribed by law.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill? The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. JONES, of Ohio. I would like to ask another question of the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. EDEN. I am willing to answer questions.

Mr. JONES, of Ohio. I wish to ask whether, under a provision attached to the appropriation act of 1874, the Treasury Department is not considering claims filed after 1873.

Mr. EDEN. The act of 1874 has nothing to do with this class of claims at all. That act applies only to claims that were referred to the Quartermaster-General and Commissary-General, under the act of July 4, 1864. These claims arise under the act of March 3, 1871, and are an entirely different class of claims.

Mr. POTTER. I desire to ask the gentleman from Illinois whether I am right in supposing that Congress, in order to get rid of the determination of certain claims, established a court in which they should be tried, and whether the awards or judgments of that court are now brought here and we are asked to appropriate money to pay them?

Mr. EDEN. That is it.

Mr. POTTER. That is all there is of it?

Mr. EDEN. Yes, sir.

There is a single section proposed by the committee by way of amendment which it is due to the House I should explain before proceeding further. On the 3d of March last, in order to have these claims disposed of at as early a day as possible, there was inserted, upon my motion, in the bill extending the term of the commissioners, a provision limiting the time for taking testimony by claimants to the 10th of March, 1878. The claimants being scattered over so wide a territory, it took a very considerable length of time for them to have notice; and there is complaint made that some of them did not get notice in time to complete the taking of their testimony. Hence we propose to amend this bill by giving them until the 1st of January next to complete the taking of testimony. But this provision does not permit the filing of any additional claims; it merely allows claimants to complete the taking of testimony in reference to cases that have already been filed. I have no doubt that it will be for the best interests of the Government that the time should be extended; otherwise, claims will be left upon the hands of Congress to be disposed of after the commission shall have gone out of existence.

Mr. WHITE, of Pennsylvania. Have all these claims been passed upon by the commission?

Mr. EDEN. Every one of them. Now, Mr. Speaker, if there be no further question, I will ask that the bill and amendments be read, excluding the mere list of claims.

The bill, with the amendments proposed by the committee, was read. The amendments were agreed to.

The bill, as amended, was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. EDEN moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

JOSEPH R. SHANNON.

Mr. EDEN, from the Committee on War Claims, reported a bill (H. R. No. 4135) for the relief of Joseph R. Shannon; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

Mr. THOMPSON, by unanimous consent, presented the views of the minority of the committee upon the bill just reported; which were ordered to be printed with the report of the committee, and referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar.

HEIRS OF CLAUDE N. JOHNSON.

Mr. CALDWELL, of Kentucky, from the Committee on War Claims, reported back adversely a petition for the relief of the heirs of Claude N. Johnson, of Lexington, Kentucky; which was laid upon the table, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

Mr. CALDWELL, of Kentucky, moved to reconsider the vote by which the petition was laid on the table; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

LUCIE A. JAMESON.

Mr. CALDWELL, of Kentucky, also, from the same committee, reported a bill (H. R. No. 4136) for the relief of Lucie A. Jameson, of Shelby County, Tennessee; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

E. P. McNEAL.

Mr. CALDWELL, of Kentucky, also, from the same committee, reported a bill (H. R. No. 4137) for the relief of E. P. McNeal, of Hardeman County, Tennessee; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

JOHN T. STRATTON AND OTHERS.

Mr. SHELLEY, from the Committee on War Claims, reported a bill (H. R. No. 4138) for the relief of John T. Stratton, Edgar McDavitt, and Samuel H. Dunscomb, of the city of Memphis, Tennessee; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

W. R. BOICE.

Mr. SHELLEY also, from the same committee, reported a bill (H. R. No. 4139) for the relief of W. R. Boice, of Danville, Kentucky; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

SAMUEL M. BLAIR.

Mr. SHELLEY also, from the same committee, reported back, with a favorable recommendation, a bill (H. R. No. 2462) for the relief of Samuel M. Blair, of Boston, Massachusetts; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

HENRY S. FRENCH.

Mr. OLIVER, from the Committee on War Claims, reported, as a substitute for House bill No. 363, a bill (H. R. No. 4140) for the relief of Henry S. French, of Nashville, Tennessee; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

A. H. HERR.

Mr. OLIVER also, from the same committee, reported, as a substitute for House bill No. 1319, a bill (H. R. No. 4141) for the relief of A. H. Herr; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

LEGAL REPRESENTATIVES OF JOSHUA HILL, DECEASED.

Mr. OLIVER also, from the same committee, reported, as a substitute for House bill No. 2373, a bill (H. R. No. 4142) for the relief of Harriet C. Hill and James N. Hill, heirs at law of Joshua Hill, deceased; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

JOHN ADAMS AND OTHERS.

Mr. OLIVER also, from the same committee, reported, as a substitute for House bills Nos. 2589, 2590, 2591, 2592, 2593, and 3087, a bill (H. R. No. 4143) for the relief of John Adams, William B. Clift, David Dunsceath, William Killinger, J. F. Scott, (administrator of the estate of Obediah Scott, deceased,) Davis C. Peak, Charles Linderman, James Linnane, Patrick Carey, John McMahon, and James Gorman, (administrator of the estate of Patrick Gorman, deceased;) which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

CLAIMS OF DAKOTA VOLUNTEER FORCES.

Mr. OLIVER also, from the Committee on War Claims, reported back, with a favorable recommendation, the bill (H. R. No. 1189) to extend the time one year for presenting the claims of Dakota volunteer forces, as examined and reported upon by General Hardie, under the special act of Congress approved February 20, 1874, to the proper accounting officers for approval and payment.

The bill was read. It extends for one year from the passage of the act the time for presenting the claims of Dakota volunteer forces, as examined and reported upon by Inspector-General James A. Hardie, under the special act of Congress for that purpose, approved February 20, 1874, to the proper accounting officers of the Treasury to pass upon, approve, and pay.

Mr. OLIVER. Some time since, on the 3d of March, 1875, Congress made an appropriation for the payment of these volunteers. The commission had already examined the claims and ascertained them, and an appropriation was made for their payment; but the time for proving up the claims was limited to one year, and the money has already been drawn out of the Treasury under the appropriation and is in the hands of the disbursing officer.

These services were rendered in 1862. Owing to the long time that had elapsed between the time the services were rendered and the time of the appropriation, many of the parties had ceased to be citizens of the Territory, many of them had died, and about seventy claims were not presented for payment within the time. This bill simply proposes to extend for one year the time for presenting those claims for payment. The claims have already been passed upon, and the money has been appropriated for their payment and is in the hands of the disbursing officer.

If no further explanation is desired, I move the previous question. The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. OLIVER moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

JOHN T. NEALE.

Mr. ROBINSON, of Indiana, from the Committee on War Claims, reported back, with a favorable recommendation, the bill (H. R. No. 1286) granting relief to John T. Neale, an employé of the Provost-Marshal-General's department in 1861, for injuries sustained in the line of his duty; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

WILLIAM FALLS.

Mr. ROBINSON, of Indiana, also, from the same committee, reported a bill (H. R. No. 4144) for the relief of William Falls, of Alexandria County, Virginia; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

J. J. CUMMINGS.

Mr. KEIFER, from the Committee on War Claims, reported back, with an adverse recommendation, the bill (H. R. No. 416) for the relief of J. J. Cummings, of Tennessee; and the same was laid on the table, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

Mr. KEIFER moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was laid on the table; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

RANCHO LAS CRUCES LAND CLAIM.

Mr. DENISON, from the Committee on Private Land Claims, reported back, with amendments, the bill (H. R. No. 2401) to authorize the claimants to certain lands in Santa Barbara County, California, to submit their claim to the United States district court for that State for adjudication.

The bill was read. It permits and authorizes the claimants to lands situated in Santa Barbara County, California, known as the Rancho Las Cruces, who derive title through the original Mexican grantee of said rancho, to present their claim to said lands to the district court of the United States for the district of California for examination; and provides that if, upon the hearing of said case, it shall appear to said court that the claim of the original grantee was good and valid under Mexican laws relating to such cases, the said court shall by decree confirm said claim; and also provides that no lands shall be confirmed to said claimants by said decree to which there are any valid claims existing under the pre-emption or homestead laws of the United States at the date of the passage of the act.

The bill in its second section provides that in case said claim is rejected by said court, then said claimants are thereby granted the right of appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States, within the time and in the manner now provided by law in like cases.

The bill in its third section directs the United States surveyor-general for California, upon the filing in his office by said claimants of a certified copy of a final decree of confirmation, under the provisions of the act, to cause said claim to be surveyed as other claims of like nature are now surveyed under existing laws; and provides that upon the approval of said survey by the Commissioner of the General Land Office a patent shall issue to said claimants in the usual form.

The amendments of the committee were read, as follows:

In section 1, line 13, after the word "decree" insert "exceeding in area eighty-eight hundred and eighty-eight acres, nor any lands."

Add to section 2 the words "The said courts in the examination of the claims presented by any person under this act shall be governed so far as applicable by the provisions of the act passed March 3, A. D. 1851, entitled 'An act to ascertain and settle private land claims in the State of California.'"

Mr. DENISON. In 1833, Miguel Cordero went into possession of about two leagues of land called the Rancho Las Cruces, in Santa Barbara County, California. He remained in possession of that land until 1837. In that year it was granted to Cordero by the Mexican government. Immediately thereafter he took juridical possession, having been in actual possession all the time from 1833 until 1837. He continued in possession till March 3, 1851, the date of the statute by which claimants presented their claims to the commissioners. A few days after March 3, 1851, he died in possession of that land. He had built houses, he had cultivated, he had planted vineyards, he had planted orchards, and his family, a wife and nine children, were residing there at the time of his death. He still remained in possession till his death and after that his heirs remained in possession and continued in possession and do still, the land never having been divided in any way, the land belonging to his heirs and their grantees. The land is still in their possession, the possession of these grantees and the heirs, nobody claiming any right whatever to it.

It will be perceived that it was almost impossible for anybody claiming under it to know of the passage of the law of March 3, 1851, they all being ignorant of the English language and out in that wild region having no information whatever of the proceeding of Congress. No one claims the land. No one claimed it then nor has claimed it since; so that no one had any occasion then to press a claim against these parties. That is the condition of the land now. And all they ask is to be permitted to go before the courts under the law of 1851 to set up their claims. That is the object of the bill, and I hope it will be passed without being referred to the Committee of the Whole.

The amendments reported by the committee were adopted.

The bill, as amended, was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. DENISON moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. BRIGHT. Has the morning hour expired?

The SPEAKER. It has.

treaty with the Pottawatomie Indians, which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar. Mr. MCKENZIE, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on Railways and Canals, reported back the memorial of M. R. Jefferts in relation to the Galveston and Camargo Railroad, and moved that the same be recommitted to the committee and ordered to be printed, not to be brought back by a motion to reconsider.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CONGER. I move to reconsider the several votes by which references have been made; and also move that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

METRIC SYSTEM.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I ask unanimous consent to have printed the letters of the Secretary of the Treasury to the Speaker of the House of March 26, 1878, in reply to the resolution of the House of Representatives asking for opinion as to the introduction of the metric system, with accompanying papers, which were referred to the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures.

There being no objection, it was so ordered.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia, also, (by request,) by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4146) to promote the general use of the metric system; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures, and ordered to be printed.

REFUND OF TONNAGE DUES.

Mr. WILSON. I desire unanimous consent in behalf of the Committee on Foreign Affairs to offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on Foreign Affairs be authorized to have printed its additional report on House bill 1118, a bill providing for the refund of tonnage dues.

The resolution was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. BRIGHT. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar.

Mr. GOODE. Pending that motion I move that all debate on the bill pending in Committee of the Whole be restricted to forty minutes. It is a bill for the relief of the Bartholomew County Agricultural Society of the State of Indiana, and it has been partially heretofore considered on two Fridays.

Mr. CONGER. I object. When we go into Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar to take up the bill we can judge as to the necessity of closing debate upon it.

Mr. GOODE. I ask the order of the House, notwithstanding the gentleman's objection.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. It is an important bill, involving an important principle, and should be well considered.

The SPEAKER. This bill occupies an unusual position, for it has already been engrossed.

Mr. EDEN. It was once reported favorably from the Committee of the Whole, and afterward sent back to the Committee of the Whole upon a single objection.

The SPEAKER. If the bill is in Committee of the Whole the House has a right to limit the debate thereon.

Mr. GOODE. I make the motion to limit the debate to forty minutes.

The question was taken upon Mr. GOODE's motion; and there were—ayes 82, noes 44; no quorum voting.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. GOODE and Mr. RYAN were appointed.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 114, noes 45. So the motion was agreed to.

The question recurred on Mr. BRIGHT's motion; and it was agreed to. The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, (Mr. BEEBE in the chair.)

BARTHOLOMEW COUNTY AGRICULTURAL SOCIETY OF INDIANA.

The CHAIRMAN. The first business before the Committee is the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 1894) for the relief of the Bartholomew County Agricultural Society of the State of Indiana.

Mr. SHELLEY. I ask for the reading of the bill.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the sum of $1,500 be, and is hereby, appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to be paid to the Bartholomew County Agricultural Society, in full payment and satisfaction for the use and occupation of the fair grounds of said society for military purposes, from September, 1863, to June, 1865.

Mr. SHELLEY. I now call for the reading of the report.
The Clerk read the report, as follows:

It is shown by the evidence that the grounds were occupied under a written lease for military purposes from September, 1863, to June, 1865. The lease on the part of the United States was executed by Thomas O. Wilson, first lieutenant and quartermaster for Third Congressional District Indiana Volunteers, and on the part of the society by its president, treasurer, and secretary. The rent was to be $100 per month. Upon the recommendation of the Provost-Marshal-General $536.66 of the rent was paid on the 24th day of February, 1865. On the 31st of January, 1872, the chief quartermaster of the Department of the Lakes referred the residue of the claim to the Adjutant-General, who on the 4th of April, 1872, decided that his department could not entertain the demand for damages, at the same time remarking that Congress alone could afford relief. He further says that the matter of damages had been considered with the claim for rent, and that Colonel Stansifer, the provost-marshal for that district, had reported in 1865 that $100, as agreed upon for the use of the ground, was intended to cover all claims for damages. No such report from Colonel Stansifer is found among the papers. Colonel Stansifer is one of the principal witnesses supporting the demand, the unpaid balance of rent and damages. There is no evidence that when $536.66 was paid on the rent the matter of damages was included, estimated, or considered. On the contrary, it clearly appears that such could not have been the fact, for that sum was paid for the use of the ground from October 25, 1863, (the date of the lease,) to April 6, 1864, a period of five months and eleven days, and was the exact sum that would be required to pay the rent for that period at the rate of $100 per month.

The lease contains a clause which provides that the United States shall repair all damage that may be occasioned to the grounds or buildings while so used and occupied. It is claimed by the Adjutant-General that this clause has been inserted since the execution of the instrument, and in proof of this, in addition to the appearance of the lease itself, he produces a copy of the same containing no such words, made out and certified to as a true copy on the 4th day of October, 1865, by James B. Mulky, then provost-marshal of that district. In this connection it is well to state that Lieutenant Wilson, who executed the lease on behalf of the United States, testifies on behalf of the society, very fully and clearly sustaining the claim for rent and damages, and in his affidavit he makes special mention (as if he regarded the same valid and binding) of the clause about damages. Assuming that this provision was not in the lease originally, nor afterward inserted with the consent of any person competent to bind the Government; still it would seem that the latter would be required by the law to restore the grounds to the society as they were when possession was taken, making reasonable allowance for wear and decay.

The Adjutant-General says nothing more should be paid for rent. He says that the claim for $536.66, and a claim for $123.23, presented thereafter in October, 1864, together cover a period of only six months and nine days. There is no force in this point, for the reason that the statement upon which the $536.66 was paid, as also the claim for $123.23, which was never paid, were both for only such periods of time as the grounds were occupied for the rendezvous and organization of the One hundred and fortieth Regiment of Indiana Volunteers, prior to complete organization and muster. The society had the right to believe, and probably did believe, from an opinion which had been expressed by the Quartermaster-General, (as appears from papers on file,) that a distinction should be kept up between the times the grounds were used for collecting, organizing, and drilling volunteers and other periods for which they may have been otherwise used.

At the second session of the Forty-third Congress the Committee on War Claims reported favorably upon this claim, and reported a bill appropriating $1,550 in payment thereof, and at the first session of the Forty-fourth Congress made a similar report, and reported a bill appropriating $1,500 in full satisfaction of said claim.

Your committee find from the evidence that the society should be allowed the sum of $1,500 for unpaid rent, and accordingly report the accompanying bill appropriating that sum in full payment and satisfaction of the claim.

Mr. SHELLEY. I yield twenty minutes to the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. FINLEY.]

Mr. FINLEY. Mr. Chairman, I have taken some pains to examine into the character of this claim, and if I can have the attention of the committee for a few moments I think I shall be able to show that the claim should not be paid, not only because it is a stale claim, but as I think I will be able to show, because it is, if not a fraudulent claim, a fishy one, to say the least of it.

Now, the very first sentence in the report of this committee is an error. The committee state that these grounds were occupied for military purposes from September 1, 1863, under the contract. Now I have the original contract here, and it is dated October 25, 1863. I have taken some pains to get all the papers in the case, and I ask the attention of gentlemen to the facts as developed by an examination of those papers.

On the 25th day of October, 1863, Lieutenant Thomas C. Wilson, a quartermaster in the service of the State troops of Indiana, a gentleman whom the War Department says had no authority whatever to make a contract to bind the Government, not being in the service of the United States, undertook to, and did make a contract, as the contract says.

Mr. BRIGHT. I wish to ask the gentleman if the testimony which he now proposes to detail is embodied in the evidence before the Committee on War Claims, or is it outside of that testimony?

Mr. FINLEY. I do not know. I will say to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BRIGHT] that I derive all my information from the original papers in the case, furnished to me by the Adjutant-General. This Wilson undertook to and did make a contract, and I call attention to the wording of the contract. He undertakes to contract in behalf of the United States and of the State of Indiana. By the terms of that contract he agrees, in behalf of the United States and of the State of Indiana, that they will pay to the Bartholomew County Agricultural Society the sum of $100 per month, while they were organizing the regiments that were then being organized at that place, the One hundred and twentieth and One hundred and twenty-fifth Regiments of Indiana Volunteers.

On the 3d day of May, 1864, that organization was complete, and the Bartholomew County Agricultural Society made out a bill for the use of the grounds, which bill I hold in my hand. That bill is for $633 for the use of the grounds of the society from the day the contract was made, October 25, 1863, to May 3, 1864, the time when the organization of the regiments was completed. That bill upon examination by the Department was found to be erroneous in regard to the time of occupation. On the 25th day of February, 1865, the Department paid $536.66 in full for the use of the grounds, and I have here the bill and receipt, which is as follows:

The United States to the stockholders of the Bartholomew County fair ground, Columbus, Indiana, Dr.

May 3. For six months and ten days' rent of the Bartholomew County fair-ground with building, &c., occupied as a camp of rendezvous for the third congressional district of Indiana Volunteers and the Tenth Indiana Cavalry. (One hundred and twenty-fifth Indiana Volunteers,) commencing October 25, 1863, and ending May 3, 1864, (inclusive,) at $100 per month. . . . $633 33
Allowed by Paymaster-General from October 25, 1863, to April 6, 1864, at $100 per month, five months, eleven days, $536.66 . . . 633 33

I certify that the above account is accurate and just; that the ground above enumerated was occupied as specified, and that its occupation was absolutely necessary for the public service for troops raised for the United States who were actually mustered into the United States service.

Approved from October 25, 1863, to April 6, 1864.

T. G. PITCHER,

Brigadier-General Volunteers; Superintendent Volunteer Recruiting Service.

Approved:

THOMAS C. WILSON,

First Lieutenant and Quartermaster Third Congressional District Regiment, Indiana Volunteers.

S. STANSIFER,

Commandant of Camp Third District, Indiana.

Received at Indianapolis, Indiana, this 24th of February, 1865, of Major S. B. Hayman, Tenth Infantry military and division officer, the sum of $536.66 in full of the above account, which has not been previously paid by the United States or the State of Indiana.

B. F. JONES,

Treasurer Bartholomew County Fair Ground.

Sent check No. 318 to B. F. Jones, treasurer, at Columbus, Indiana, as directed by letter.

The Adjutant-General says, as appears from an indorsement on one of the vouchers, that that payment completed the contract. He said that Wilson had no power to make it in the first place, but as the United States had had the use of the grounds it was proper to pay for them, and it was paid, and the contract was closed and ended.

What next followed? On the 19th day of October, 1865, one year and eight months after this bill had been paid, the Bartholomew County Agricultural Society again presented a bill. What for? For the use of these grounds from September 7, 1864, to October 4, 1864. They made no account of the interim between May 3, 1864, and September 7, 1864, and made no charge for the use of the grounds during that period. I desire members of this committee to notice that. The amount of their second claim was $123.23, and when they presented this second bill it was accompanied by what purported to be the contract made by this man Wilson. On the back of that contract is the certificate of the provost-marshal in charge, that it was a correct copy. That copy of the contract they forwarded with the bill; and the Adjutant-General rejected the bill and the War Department approved that rejection on the ground that there was no authority for this contract, that the United States had not had the use of the property under any contract, and was not liable for the payment of this second bill. The following is what was decided; which I will print with my remarks:

Brigadier General T. G. Pitcher refers account of the Bartholomew County Agricultural Society (B. F. Jones, treasurer) for rent of grounds for camp of rendezvous—amount $123.33—for the One hundred and fortieth Regiment Indiana Volunteers.

Respectfully returned to Brigadier General Pitcher. This is a matter about which I have no information except that derived from the inclosed papers. It was under the sole control of the State authorities, and mainly if not wholly in contradiction of the orders of the War Department. I can therefore neither approve nor disapprove.

JAMES G. JONES,

Late Colonel and Acting Assistant Provost-Marshal-General.

From the indorsement of Colonel Jones, the then superintendent of volunteer recruiting service for the State of Indiana, it appears that no authority was ever given by the United States to rent these grounds.

If the commandant of camp of rendezvous, third district of Indiana, was authorized by the State to rent the grounds, then the State becomes responsible for the rent and claimant must look to that source for payment.

The person appointed commandant of the camp of rendezvous by the governor of the State was so appointed in direct conflict with General Orders No. 79, of 1864, from the Adjutant-General's Office, dated February 29, 1864.

This account is rejected as a claim against the United States.

By order of the Provost-Marshal-General:

C. McKEEVER,

Assistant Adjutant-General.

PROVOST-MARSHAL GENERAL'S OFFICE, October 20, 1865.

Official:

E. D. TOWNSEND,

Adjutant-General.

I will have this contract read as a part of my argument, and I ask the attention of the Committee of the Whole to the fact that when this certified copy was sent in along with the voucher the words were not in it which appear in a copy of the contract which was subsequently furnished. This copy closed with the words "Witness our hands and seal the day and year within," and it is signed by Thomas P. Wilson, Thomas Davies, B. F. Jones, treasurer, and W. W. Herod, secretary.

This copy of the contract, certified by the provost-marshal to be a correct copy of the original in his possession, and which was sent by the Bartholomew County Agricultural Society in support of its claim, reads as follows:

This article of agreement, made and entered into this 25th day of October, A. D. 1863, between First Lieutenant Thomas C. Wilson, quartermaster Third Congressional District Regiment of Indiana Volunteers, of the one part, and Thomas Hays, Benjamin F. Jones, and William W. Herod, on the part of the stockholders of the Bartholomew County Fair Grounds, of the county of Bartholomew and State of Indiana, of the other part, witnesseth, that the said Lieutenant Thomas C. Wilson, for and on behalf of the State of Indiana and the United States, and the said Thomas Hays, Benjamin F. Jones, and William W. Herod, for members and the said stockholders and their heirs, executors, and administrators, have covenanted and agreed with each other as follows:

The said Thomas Hays, Benjamin F. Jones, and William W. Herod do hereby lease and rent to the said Lieutenant Thomas C. Wilson, for the use of the State of Indiana and the United States, the grounds, with all the buildings thereon, known as the fair grounds of Bartholomew County, Indiana, situated about one mile east-southeast of the town of Columbus, for a camp and rendezvous for the ——— Regiment of Indiana Volunteers, now organizing in third district of Indiana, at the price of $100 per month, and at the rate per day for every day over and above equal months, to be held and occupied for the purpose aforesaid, and for the wants of the service generally, so long as it may be needed.

Witness our hands and seals the day and year above written.

THOMAS C. WILSON,
First Lieutenant, Quartermaster Third Congressional District Regiment Indiana Volunteers.
THOMAS HAYS,
President Bartholomew County Agricultural Society.
B. F. JONES,
Treasurer Bartholomew County Agricultural Society.
W. W. HEROD,
Secretary Bartholomew County Agricultural Society.

PROVOST-MARSHAL'S OFFICE, THIRD DISTRICT INDIANA,
Columbus, October 4, 1865.

I certify that the within is a true copy of the lease with the Bartholomew County Agricultural Society, and that a copy of the same is now on file in the War Department.

JAMES B. MULKEY,
Captain and Provost-Marshal Third District Indiana.

Five years and seven months after the presentation of the first bill, to wit, on the 25th day of January, 1870, the bill which is now before this committee was presented by or through Mr. Holman, then a member of this House. That bill went clear back to the beginning, and I have it here. It reads as follows:

The United States to the Bartholomew County Indiana Agricultural Society, Dr.
June 1, 1865. For occupation of ground for military purposes from September 1, 1863, to date, as per contract herewith $2,100
To damage to buildings, fences, &c., as set forth in affidavit herewith 2,000
4,100
March 1, 1864. By cash on account of rent 533
3,567

It will be seen that the bill presented on the 25th of January, 1870, was a bill for the use of the grounds of this society from the 1st day of September, 1863, to June 1, 1865. Gentlemen will bear in mind that the first bill presented and paid was from October 25, 1863. But when the bill was presented in 1870 it goes back and charges for the use of the grounds, commencing at a period more than a month before the contract was made and runs to the 1st day of September, 1863. The charge in that bill is for the use of the grounds from September 1, 1863, to June 1, 1865, $2,100; for damages to the property, $2,000.

With that bill comes what purports to be the original contract made October 25, 1863. But in that contract, immediately above the signatures of the parties, is written a clause that the United States shall be responsible and pay for all damages to the grounds. This clause, which is inserted immediately above the signatures in the contract and which was not in the original copy sent to the War Department, reads as follows:

And the said Wilson, on behalf of the State of Indiana and the United States, undertakes to repair all damage that may be occasioned to said fair grounds or buildings while used and occupied for the purposes specified in this lease.

When that bill was presented to the Quartermaster-General he refused to allow it on the ground, first, that the United States had paid for the use of the grounds for the time they had used them under the contract and, secondly, because the contract had been altered. I send to the Clerk's desk to be read what he said about it at that time.

Mr. EDEN. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. FINLEY. Certainly.

Mr. EDEN. Is the gentleman not aware that the bill now before the House does not propose to pay one cent for damages to the property, but simply for the time it was occupied by our troops?

Mr. FINLEY. I will come to that in a moment. It is true that the Committee on War Claims of this House have thrown out the claim for damages. But the point I desire to make is that the parties who presented this bill undertook by the alteration, if they did alter and forge the contract, to procure from the United States the sum of $2,100 by reason of the alteration that they themselves made.

Mr. THOMPSON. Will you allow me to ask you a question in this connection?

Mr. FINLEY. I will.

Mr. THOMPSON. In your view of the matter, do you resist the payment of this bill on the ground of its merits or on the legal ground that the change of the agreement, as you allege, destroys the effect of the contract?

Mr. FINLEY. I resist the claim because there is nothing due.

Mr. THOMPSON. Then what has the question whether there is an alteration or not to do with the case?

Mr. FINLEY. Simply as showing the animus of persons who would forge a contract and attempt to get $2,100 out of the United States in that way.

Mr. ROBINSON, of Indiana. Does the gentleman charge that these men forged the contract?

Mr. FINLEY. I do not. I say simply that it is a question to be determined by this House, as it was determined by the Adjutant-General, whether the contract was altered or not.

Mr. EDEN. Does the gentleman say that the men connected with the Bartholomew Agricultural Society had anything to do with the change of the contract?

Mr. FINLEY. I will explain the testimony when we come to it. I ask the Clerk to read the decision of the Adjutant-General which I have sent to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

On June 8, 1864, a claim for the rent of those grounds from October 25, 1863, to May 3, 1864, amounting to $633, was received in this office from Captain J. H. Farquhar. It was fully investigated, and on February 24, 1865, Major S. B. Hayman paid the amount allowed, $536.66, that being all that was deemed a proper charge against the appropriation for collecting, drilling, and organizing volunteers.

A certified copy of the records in the case is herewith, marked "A," which fully explains the action had and the evidence upon which said claim was allowed; also a certified copy of the voucher paid by Major Hayman, marked "B."

On October 19, 1865, another account was received in this office for the rent of the same ground from September 7, 1864, to October 4, 1864, based upon the same contract, amounting to $123.33, and was rejected for the reasons set forth in the endorsement thereon. The papers and evidence presented in support of this claim are herewith, in package marked "C."

It will be observed that the first claim commences October 25, 1863, date of lease, and runs to May 3, 1864. In September, 1865, another claim is made for rent from September 7, 1864, to October 4, 1864. In the latter claim no mention is made of the occupation of the grounds from May 3 to September 4, or from October 4, 1864, to June, 1865, although the claim was made out in September, 1865.

If the parties had intended to claim compensation for these periods, they should have done so at that time, and not have waited for five years to elapse. In view of these facts the claim was rejected.

By reference to the original lease filed with the account presented by Mr. Holman, it will be observed that a clause has been inserted as follows: "And the said Wilson, on behalf of the State of Indiana and the United States, undertakes to repair all damages that may be occasioned to said fair grounds or buildings while used and occupied for the purposes specified in this lease." This has evidently been inserted since the lease was executed, and since October 4, 1865, for we have a certified copy of the lease made on that date by Captain James B. Mulkey, provost-marshal of the third district of Indiana, and said copy does not contain the clause above referred to. (See copy in package marked "C.")

The facts sworn to by Wilson, Stansifer, and Jones are incorrect, especially in the case of Stansifer. He reported in 1865 that the $100 rent to be paid was intended to cover all claims for damages enumerated in his report, and now in 1871 he swears that no provision was made by the United States for the payment of damages to said grounds. It is recommended that the rejection of the claim be adhered to.

Adjutant-General.

E. D. TOWNSEFD,
Adjutant-General.

Mr. KEIFER. I believe the time for debate on this bill was limited to forty minutes; and my colleague [Mr. FINLEY] has already occupied twenty or twenty-five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. SHELLEY] was recognized by the Chair and yielded twenty minutes to the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. FINLEY,] who still has some ten minutes of his time remaining.

Mr. FINLEY. And I do not desire this to be taken out of my time.

Mr. KEIFER. I still insist that the time was to be divided between the friends and the opponents of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is informed that there was no arrangement in the House for a division of the time. That will be a matter to be settled between the gentleman from Alabama and those desiring to speak.

Mr. KEIFER. I understood there was an agreement that would entitle the friends of the bill to at least a few minutes to answer a gentleman who seems to know nothing about the case.

Mr. SHELLEY. There was an agreement that the time should be equally divided, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FINLEY] to use half the time and the friends of the bill the other half.

The CHAIRMAN. No such agreement was brought to the knowledge of the House or the Chair.

Mr. SHELLEY. That was the agreement between the majority of the committee and the opponents of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FINLEY] will proceed.

Mr. FINLEY. Mr. Chairman, I do not charge, because I do not know, that this contract was altered by interested parties or by anybody else. All that I know about it is what I find by inspecting the contract which I hold in my hand and from what is said by the Adjutant-General. I have my own opinion upon the question, but that makes no difference. I desire to say that when this first copy was certified as correct by the provost-marshal the clause to which I have referred was not in it as the Adjutant-General says.

Mr. COBB. If the gentleman will permit me, I want to say that I know personally every man whose name is signed to that paper; and

I say that those gentlemen are men of as high honor as any man in the State of Indiana or Ohio either. The gentleman in his present remarks is doing them great injustice. They are men belonging to both political parties, who stand above suspicion in the neighborhoods in which they live.

Mr. FINLEY. I decline to yield further. I do not want a speech injected into my remarks. I wish to say once for all that I am making no charge against those gentlemen or against their personal integrity. I am simply stating what I find in the papers. I am simply giving to the House what the Adjutant-General himself reports, and his opinion upon the matter. These men may be gentlemen of the highest character for all I know; I know nothing about that; but I have this paper before me and I have found nothing in the testimony that has explained to my satisfaction this discrepancy between the original and the copy that was certified to be correct.

Now, Mr. Chairman, when that contract went to the Adjutant-General, Colonel Stansifer, who was an officer at that time in charge, certified that the first bill was to cover the whole claim, damages and all. Yet the committee say that no such report from Colonel Stansifer is found among the papers. I have that report here in my hand; it does state in substance what I have just mentioned. I will print it as a part of my argument; and it is here for any gentleman who desires to examine it. It reads as follows:

Respectfully returned to Colonel James G. Jones, acting assistant provost-marshal-general for Indiana, with the following information as to the reasonableness of the annexed claim of the stockholders of Bartholomew County fair grounds:

The fair ground indicated contains twenty-two acres, and at the time of its first occupation by troops was well fenced in by a board fence. The interior was substantially arranged with seats, stock and exhibition sheds, wells, and all the ordinary improvements incidental to fair grounds. The grounds were also peculiarly well shaded. To properly arrange the ground suitable for a camp of rendezvous, the stock sheds and seats were removed and the exhibition sheds were converted into barracks, thereby destroying all the inside arrangements for exhibition purposes. The circle fence around the race-track was destroyed. The shade trees were much injured by the hard tramping of the ground and being packed by the soldiery. The outside fencing was much injured; the pumps attached to the wells were destroyed; the committee-rooms and offices belonging to the grounds were also much injured, so much so as to render new buildings absolutely necessary. The herbage upon the ground was wholly destroyed. The amount charged I do not think unreasonable, the charge being made with the view of covering the foregoing and other injuries to the property. It is proper for me to state, however, that I am a stockholder to a small amount in the association.

S. STANSIFER,

Captain and Provost-Marshal Third District Indiana.

COLUMBUS, INDIANA, September 1, 1864.

Subsequently Colonel Stansifer makes an affidavit saying that he has no recollection of making that kind of a report; but the report is here to speak for itself.

Now, sir, this claim the payment of which is now sought was first presented in 1870 after all previous bills had been presented and after the first had been paid, the only one that was a legal claim against the United States. The only testimony offered in support of this bill is the testimony of Colonel Stansifer, and of Mr. Jones, and of Lieutenant Wilson who made the contract, a gentleman who has since died. Stansifer testifies that he is a stockholder in the society. Mr. Jones is the secretary of the society. All the affidavits I have before me here in my hands. The first one, dated August 3, 1871, is by Stansifer; the second, dated January 1, 1867 by Stansifer and Jones; the third, bearing date April 17, 1877 by Stansifer; the next, dated June 27, 1877, by Stansifer and Jones; the next, dated April 17, 1877, by Jones; and the last, by Stansifer. I have examined each of these affidavits. They were given in support of the first claim. Then they took a second swear at the second claim, and a third swear at the third claim; yet, Mr. Chairman, I have been unable to see in all the testimony anything to justify me in voting for this stale, "fishy" claim.

Mr. EDEN. Why does the gentleman omit to refer to Lieutenant Wilson?

Mr. FINLEY. The gentleman asks me why I omit Lieutenant Wilson. There is nothing in his testimony that throws any light on this claim. He says that he made the contract; but he notably omits to say that the contract had a clause in it making the United States responsible for damages.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. SHELLEY. I yield for ten minutes to the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. BICKNELL.]

Mr. BICKNELL. Mr. Chairman, the claim as allowed by the committee is a claim for rent only due upon a written contract made with the quartermaster, ratified by the United States by twenty months' occupation, and still further ratified by payment for the first five months according to the terms of the contract.

Mr. LATHROP. On the gentleman's statement I would like to know why the Clerk of this House has not sent this claim to the Court of Claims, according to the provisions of section 1060 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, which requires all such cases shall be sent to the Court of Claims for adjudication. There has been no resolution, as I understand, of the House directing otherwise. If so, when was it?

Mr. EDEN. The law expressly forbids the Court of Claims considering this class of cases.

Mr. LATHROP. The law expressly confers jurisdiction upon the Court of Claims.

Mr. BICKNELL. I suppose this will not be taken out of my time. The CHAIRMAN. It certainly will.

Mr. BICKNELL. I cannot yield any more.

I said it was a claim for rent only. There is no question of damages now connected with it. There was a question of damages originally, and upon that a dispute arose as to what was contained in the contract. That dispute led to a great deal of litigation and a great deal of delay; but when the case came up the committee struck out the claim for damages and reported the claim for rent only.

The question is, how long were the premises occupied? It is shown by the evidence and it is stated in the report, and this report itself furnishes a complete answer to everything which the gentleman from Ohio has alleged. It is shown by the evidence the grounds were occupied, under a written lease, for military purposes, from September, 1863, to June, 1865. Then there was a payment for five months and a few days. It is said by the gentleman from Ohio that was in full for the entire claim. That also is explained in the report:

The society had the right to believe, and probably did believe, from an opinion which had been expressed by the Quartermaster-General, (as appears from papers on file) that a distinction should be kept up between the times the grounds were used for collecting, organizing and drilling volunteers, and other periods for which they may have been otherwise used.

This payment which was made was payment for the time only when they had been used for collecting, organizing, and drilling volunteers, and they were used for military purposes for the whole fifteen months. It is the balance only of that fifteen months which the committee here have allowed. That is all there is in the claim.

As to the authority of the quartermaster to make a contract, we know what Governor Morton's condition was when he was raising troops: called upon every day for troops; sending them across the river daily to Kentucky, across the mountains to Virginia, and over the prairies to Missouri; and in order to have those troops taken care of he had to employ his own quartermaster. And now they say he had no authority to make this contract! All Governor Morton's energetic action in the war was founded on the faith he had the Government would pay this expense. But now gentlemen say, when these men went to the field and gave their lives to the country, the country is not to pay for their lodging. That is the substance of it; that is all there is in the case.

I yield the remainder of my time, if I have any, to the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. EDEN.]

Mr. EDEN. The gentleman from Alabama was compelled to leave the Hall, and before leaving placed this case in my hands. I yield now to the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. ROBINSON.]

Mr. ROBINSON, of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I do not wish to advocate this or any other claim against the General Government which I think is unjust; but this claim was reported by the unanimous consent of the Committee on War Claims as being a just claim, predicated upon a contract which was entered into between the authorized agent of the Government and this agricultural society.

I wish now simply to advert to a point which has been made by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. FINLEY,] by which he has attempted to cast some suspicion upon the manner in which this contract between the Government and the agricultural society was executed. If the gentleman from Ohio was acquainted with either of the gentlemen who signed that contract I take it he would be far from attempting to cast any suspicion whatever upon them. They are honorable gentlemen, and if he had taken the trouble to examine the testimony of these gentlemen he would have ascertained that it was clearly shown by that testimony that the interlineation he objects to in the contract was made before it was signed, but by an oversight it was not written in the contract executed in duplicate which was filed with the proper authorities of the Government.

Now, sir, this was a contract. It was entered into in good faith. It was carried out in good faith. It was between honorable parties who have a just claim against the Government of the United States. It is in no sense of the word, sir, a war claim; but it was an absolute engagement to pay $100 a month rent for the occupancy of the agricultural society's grounds, which the evidence shows beyond any kind of controversy were occupied for that space of time, and for that rent alone was allowed.

Now, the words that were interlined in the contract were provided that the Government should be liable for any damages that would occur by the use of the grounds in the recruiting of troops. It is shown in the testimony that damages by reason of fire, to the extent of $2,000, were done to the fair-ground in the destruction of its property. But as there was a controversy upon that subject the committee refused to allow the amount of damages, and simply reported the bill for the balance of the rent which is due.

This matter was fully investigated in the last Congress by Judge New, who represented that congressional district, and the bill passed this House. The claim also, I believe, was investigated and reported favorably in the previous Congress; and the validity and honesty of the claim have never been questioned until this present session of Congress.

I have no doubt that, upon the contract and the evidence, we will be doing an act of injustice if this bill is not passed and the claim paid.

I wish to say just one other word, and then I suppose my time will have expired. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FINLEY] has, by innuendo and by intimation, attacked the character of men who I have no doubt would, anywhere upon the broad face of the globe, if the question of character were at stake, have as good a character and as good a reputation as the gentleman from Ohio or any other man upon this floor. There was no such intention, no such purpose as he ascribes to them; and there is nothing in the evidence in this case to justify the intimation that any wrong, any forgery, has been attempted by the men who made that contract, or that there was on their part any fraudulent intent or purpose. I say, therefore, that this is a just claim; and the Committee on War Claims were unanimously of the opinion, under the evidence and under the contract, that it should be paid; and it would be a want of good faith on the part of the General Government if it was not paid.

A question was asked why the claim was not referred to the Court of Claims. The answer is, for the reason that the Court of Claims and the southern claims commission have no jurisdiction of this class of claims. If this claim had been referred to them it would simply have been dismissed. The parties have no remedy except by act of Congress.

Mr. RICE, of Ohio. I desire to ask the gentleman a question. Is there any question about the length of time the troops occupied the premises?

Mr. ROBINSON, of Indiana. No, sir; there is no question about that under the evidence.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. SHELLEY rose.

The CHAIRMAN. Of the time allowed for general debate but three minutes remain. The time occupied in reading the report was eight minutes, and the Chair is informed by the Clerk that that is considered as part of the time for general debate.

Mr. BRIGHT. I do not think it is usual to consider the time occupied in reading the bill and report as part of the time allowed for general debate.

The CHAIR. The Chair is so informed by the Clerk. But if there be general consent the eight minutes occupied in reading the report will not be deducted.

There was no objection.

Mr. SHELLEY. When authority was given by the General Government to the State governments to organize and drill troops in the different Northern States an appropriation was made for that purpose. When this contract was made the troops had occupied these fair-grounds for nearly a month. The contract was agreed upon at the rate of $100 a month, and signed by the officers of the Government and the owners of the fair-grounds. When their claim was presented it was found that it was for a time that was not covered by the organization and drilling of the troops; and therefore it was rejected, the appropriation being confined to the organization and drilling of the troops.

This explains the presentation of the two accounts that were presented to the quartermaster for payment. The only claim that could be recognized was for such time as the fair-grounds were used by the State officers in the organization and drilling of these troops.

The evidence shows that the fair-grounds were continuously occupied as a hospital and for other purposes; but, as the officers of the United States had no authority to pay for the occupation of grounds as a hospital out of the appropriation made for other purposes, the claim was rejected.

There is no evidence to show there was any fraud in this matter at all. The interlineation of the lease in possession of the officers in the fair-grounds is explained by the fact that it was drawn up and signed by the officers of the Government and presented to the officers of the fair-grounds for their consideration and acceptance. They returned the lease to Lieutenant Wilson, suggesting this change in the contract providing for the payment of damages. It was inserted in the contract which was delivered to them and not in the duplicate which was filed in the papers of the Department. But whether it was interlined or not makes no difference as to the equity and merits of the claim. The evidence is conclusive, showing the grounds were continuously occupied for twenty-one months; the evidence is conclusive, showing the rate per month agreed upon by the Government and these parties was $100 per month; and the evidence is conclusive, showing the amount paid by the Government on account of rent. That amount, deducted from the amount due, leaves the balance which appears in the bill reported by the committee.

I believe, Mr. Chairman, this is a just and equitable claim.

Mr. CALDWELL, of Tennessee. Will the gentleman yield to me for a question?

Mr. SHELLEY. Yes, sir.

Mr. CALDWELL, of Tennessee. This claim I believe originates in the State of Indiana. It originated in a period extending from 1863 to 1865. The question I desire to put to the gentleman from Alabama is this: Is there any evidence in this record anywhere as to the loyalty of the owners of this property? I understand it was alleged that during the war there was an organization in the State of Indiana known as the Knights of the Golden Circle. Certain gentlemen supposed to belong to that organization were taken up and tried by a military commission; and before I vote on this bill I want to know whether the loyalty of the gentlemen who are the claimants here is beyond a doubt. [Laughter.]

Mr. COBB. If the gentleman will allow me, I will state that two of these gentlemen were republicans during the war and the other was a democrat who had never been charged with disloyalty.

Mr. SHELLEY. The question of loyalty was not investigated in connection with this claim. I had not been informed that citizens of the State of Indiana were required to prove their loyalty, and therefore I did not go into that question; but if they were disloyal I would nevertheless report on this claim favorably, for I believe it to be a just one. I now yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. KEIFER.]

Mr. KEIFER. I might answer the inquiry just made by the gentleman in regard to the loyalty of these persons in this way: that in an unreported case recently in the Supreme Court of the United States, that court held that where there was a contract to pay a party, made by the United States, which was valid, it was not important whether the party was loyal or not loyal. I refer to the case of Clark vs. The United States. I have no doubt about the loyalty of these men, but I need not stop to discuss that matter. The sole question involved here is whether this contract was binding on the Government. If it was, then if we refuse to pass this bill to pay this society for, as the report states, the time that the grounds of the society were occupied as a rendezvous for the organization of troops, we simply say that we repudiate Government contract.

Now, one word further. It has been intimated that this contract was a forgery in this: that it was interlined so as to attach additional obligations to the General Government after it had been executed. Now, any person who will examine the contract, the original of which the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FINLEY] holds in his hand, will be able to see, on the most casual inspection of it, that the signatures, or at least some of them, were written over that part which is claimed to have been interlined. It is clear beyond doubt that the name of Thomas Wilson was written there after the interlineation was made, for it extends over a part of that interlineation. Now it happened in this way: the contract, without those words, was sent to Washington by the officers of the Government who were authorized to make this contract; but the society refused to make with the Government any such contract as was proposed. The Government subsequently, through its officers, put in conditions that the society was willing to have put in and then the contract was executed. The Government occupied these lands before the change was made in the contract, and they are now bound to pay for that use of the property. It ought to be distinctly understood by the House that the society, by virtue of the language claimed to have been interlined in the contract, gains nothing under this bill.

Mr. JONES, of Ohio. I desire to ask the gentleman one question, for I want to get at the truth in this matter. I would ask the gentleman whether it is not a fact that this agricultural society filed its claim for the use and occupancy of its property up to May, 1864, and then, whether they did not file another claim in October, and whether both claims were paid or not? I ask now further, whether the society did not, at that time, concede that the General Government occupied their grounds from May to October, five months, and whether this bill does not propose to pay them for that time?

Mr. FINLEY. I desire to ask my colleague [Mr. KEIFER] a question. Does not this committee undertake to pay this agricultural society for the use of these grounds for one month and twenty-eight days before the contract was ever made?

Mr. KEIFER. I am informed in relation to the last question asked me, that the contract was sent out and the society surrendered their grounds to the United States, and the Government occupied them for quite a time while there was a little controversy about the execution of the contract, and that explains that trouble. But the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. JONES] asked me a question which I will endeavor to answer. I was not a member of the subcommittee which examined the papers, but my information is that no concession was made by this society that the Government had not occupied or controlled their grounds for any part of the time which it is now proposed to pay for. The gentleman is perhaps partly right when he says that some claims were presented and paid. That is true, and the committee have deducted that amount from the bill.

[Here the hammer fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time allowed for debate has expired.

Mr. SHELLEY. I move that the bill be laid aside to be reported favorably to the House.

Mr. BAKER, of Indiana. Are amendments in order?

The CHAIRMAN. They are.

Mr. BAKER, of Indiana. I move to strike out all after the enacting clause and to insert in lieu thereof the following:

That the claim of the Bartholomew County Agricultural Society, of the State of Indiana, for rent of the fair-grounds of said society, for military purposes, between the years 1863 and 1865, be, and the same is hereby, referred to the Court of Claims, which court is hereby empowered and required to take jurisdiction and cognizance of the same, and to hear and try said claim according to the ordinary rules of evidence obtaining in the trial of actions at law in the Federal courts, and that the United States shall not be permitted to interpose the statute of limitations against said claim on the trial thereof.

I desire to say a word or two upon that amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is informed that debate upon this bill is closed and that no debate will be in order until the committee proceeds to consider the bill by sections for amendments.

Mr. BAKER, of Indiana. But there is only one section and that is now under consideration.

The CHAIRMAN. Then the bill will be regarded as under consideration for amendments at the present time.

Mr. BAKER, of Indiana. My purpose in offering this amendment is simply to enable this claim to be tried before a court that will be clothed with jurisdiction to hear all the evidence in accordance with the ordinary rules obtaining in the trial of actions at law in the Federal courts. The trial of a contested question of fact, in reference to a claim, before the committee of this House and before the House itself, is one of the most unsatisfactory that ever was devised by the wit of man; not only the most unsatisfactory, but I think the most dangerous.

I confess that after all the discussion of this case which I have heard, my own mind is still in doubt in reference to the question of what amount, if any, ought actually to be paid to this agricultural society. I have been trained myself to a respect for the administration of law, and in the belief that the placing of witnesses on the stand where they may be examined and cross-examined by counsel who are employed for that purpose is the most certain means of eliciting the truth. It is for that reason that I have offered the amendment which has been read, and which, if adopted, will do justice between the parties claimant and the Government of the United States.

I can see no objection to the transfer of this case to the Court of Claims. It is peculiarly a claim that ought to undergo judicial scrutiny and investigation. If I understand aright the contract that was originally made, it would seem that it was made for certain limited and specific purposes. After those purposes had been subserved, other and additional uses were made of the grounds of this society by organizing other and additional regiments on the grounds that had thus been rented.

Mr. BICKNELL. I would like to give the gentleman a little information on that very point.

Mr. BAKER, of Indiana. I would be glad to have it.

Mr. BICKNELL. There was an occupation of those grounds by the United States for the whole twenty months. During a portion of that time the grounds were occupied for the purpose of collecting, organizing, and drilling the volunteer soldiers. During the remainder of the time the grounds were occupied as a hospital and for other purposes; there were buildings there which were used for hospital purposes. The money which has been paid was paid only for the time during which the grounds were occupied for the purpose of organizing and drilling the volunteer soldiers.

Mr. BAKER, of Indiana. That is substantially as I understand it. When these grounds were first rented they were rented for certain limited and specific purposes. When those purposes had been accomplished the grounds were used for other and different purposes by those who were engaged in the military service of the United States.

Now, I do not mean to say that the Government of the United States ought not to pay for that use. But I do say that for one I am not sufficiently advised so that I feel it is safe for me or that it is safe for this House to pass upon this claim. I think this claim ought to go to a tribunal where it can be heard according to the rules of evidence, and whatever is right and just between the Government and this society may be awarded by a definite judgment upon a full and fair hearing of the case.

[Here the hammer fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. CONGER. I rise to oppose the amendment. I suppose that were one to look back over the Northern States of the Union during the war, and should see the agricultural grounds, fenced in, with their buildings and their cattle-sheds and their horse-stables, he would probably find not one from Maine to Kansas but what some time during the war had been occupied by our volunteer soldiers. The patriotic farmers of the country said to the military authorities of the State, Take these grounds; take these buildings; use them while we are having no farms; use the stables and the sheds for your horses; use the other buildings for your men; raise your regiments and let our boys, our sons, who are coming in to form the regiments in our county, have our own fair grounds for their regimental organization and parades.

These fair-grounds were scattered broadcast in all the counties of the land. I thank God that there have been very few agricultural societies in the Northern States that have come clamoring to Congress for ten or twelve years for pay because the sons of the farmers of the county occupied the fair-grounds owned by their fathers.

This case stands almost alone. This agricultural society has already received over $500 for any little damage to its buildings and its fences and for the trampling of the grass. But it wants a couple of thousand dollars more. In what part of Indiana were these fair-grounds? To what kind of people did they belong? Were they owned by the Knights of the Golden Circle?

Mr. COBB. If the gentleman will allow me, I will say that they were owned by as loyal men as the constituents of the gentleman himself, and probably much more so.

Mr. CONGER. I do not wish to give the gentleman any offense; I have not spoken of him.

Mr. COBB. No; but you spoke of my friends.

Mr. CONGER. I have not alluded to the gentleman nor to any gentleman on this floor. I have alluded to an ancient order of men long since extinct but not yet forgotten, [laughter,] the Knights of the Golden Circle, a myth of the past, who, thank God, have no representative on this floor to take offense at what I say. [Great laughter.] Therefore no one can call me to order or question what I say on that subject.

But, sir, I was saying that all over the North not only were agricultural grounds given freely to the soldiers as they were being organized into regiments, but the ladies of the land sent blankets and tables and food, and never asked for pay. Ay, sir, not only agricultural grounds used as such but once a year were thus given freely and heartily to the soldiers that were rallying to save their country, but private dwellings and public buildings, court-houses, churches, and school-houses all over the land were given for the same purposes. Ay, sir, this very Capitol, this very Hall, was filled during the war with stretchers, on which were wounded soldiers waited upon by hundreds of patriotic women, who thus served their country for nothing and succored these soldiers. But some place in Indiana had a fair-ground fenced in to keep the boys out and to keep the soldiers in; and the agricultural society that owned that ground must be paid for its use.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. EDEN. I move to amend the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. BAKER] by striking out the last word. Mr. Chairman, the only object of the Committee on War Claims in reporting this bill was to pay what seemed to be a just and valid claim. The only difficulty in reference to the payment of the claim was not on account of any uncertainty as to the time that the property was used by the Government, but was purely on account of a technical objection under which the War Department decided that it could not make payment. Hence there is no sort of necessity for referring this case to the Court of Claims. If the Government of the United States ought to pay (and so far as I am personally concerned I do not care a farthing whether it pays or not) for the use of property which by its duly authorized officers was admitted to be worth $100 a month to the Government, the facts are all before the House as they were before the Committee on War Claims, and we can determine that question just as well as the Court of Claims can.

Mr. LUTTRELL. I would like to ask the gentleman one question. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CONGER] charges that these grounds were owned by the Knights of the Golden Circle; and he seems to be well posted on that subject. But it appears to be the fact that the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. HANNA,] a republican member, introduced the bill. I want to know how the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. EDEN] reconciles those two statements.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. You want to know "what is the matter with Hannah?" [Laughter.]

Mr. EDEN. During the last Congress when my friend from Michigan was a member of the Committee on War Claims the same committee reported by a unanimous vote the identical bill which is reported now. But I suppose the gentleman from Michigan during the course of that investigation found out that this property belonged to the Knights of the Golden Circle; and he was so derelict in his duty that he never reported that fact to the House.

Mr. LUTTRELL. Is he not a member of the order? [Laughter.] He seems to know more about it than anybody else.

Mr. EDEN. I fear that he is, for he must have ascertained these facts during the last Congress when he was a member of the Committee on War Claims, and when, in common with the other members of the committee, he reported the bill favorably, concealing from the House this fact which he now springs upon it. Therefore, I infer—I will not charge the gentleman with it—that he must have belonged to that secret and treasonable organization, [laughter;] and I suppose that he is desirous of breaking down the credit of the Government, and therefore does not want to pay a just and honest claim. That is all I have to say.

Mr. JONES, of Ohio. I rise to oppose the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. EDEN.] I desire to say just a few words about this matter. Of course I know nothing as to the status of these parties who hold this claim; but there is one fact connected with the claim which it seems to me the committee could not have had before it. Now, if I am mistaken about this I want to be corrected, because I wish to be right. I understand that the Committee on War Claims by their report propose that the Government shall pay $100 a month for the use and occupancy of these grounds from September, 1863, up to some time in 1865. Now I want some man who is in favor of paying this claim to explain to me how it happens that this agricultural society, when they made out their first claim, brought it up only to May, 1863, and when they made out their second claim made that claim commence in September, 1863, claiming nothing for the time between May, 1863, and September, 1863. In other words, how does it happen that this society knows now more about the occupation of their fair-grounds ten or fifteen years ago than they knew in 1864, when they made out their first claim, regularly certified by an officer of the society?

Mr. EDEN. This bill is to pay the balance due for rent after deducting what was paid.

Mr. JONES, of Ohio. No, sir; that is where the gentleman is mistaken.

Mr. EDEN. I certainly am not mistaken. That is the precise fact as shown by the report and the evidence.

Mr. JONES, of Ohio. If some one will hand me a copy of the report I will show the gentleman that he is mistaken. This claim is for $2,100 for occupation of the grounds from September 1, 1863, to

June 1, 1865. The committee go upon the basis of allowing the society $100 a month from the time the contract commenced until it closed, making deduction of payments already made; but that includes five months for which the society did not claim pay in 1864.

Mr. EDEN. The gentleman does not understand the case at all. The committee do not report any such thing. It is not in the papers or in the evidence.

Mr. JONES, of Ohio. Well, the society so states it. What I claim is that in 1864 this society made out its account for the balance of rent then due, and that claim was paid.

Mr. EDEN. Does the gentleman mean to say the committee report here to pay that over again? That must be what he means, if he means anything at all. I say the committee does not report any such thing, and the evidence does not show any such thing; and it is not true, sir.

Mr. JONES, of Ohio. Let me say the claim of the society when first made out was paid by the Department.

Mr. EDEN. Paid by the Department for a portion of the time. This report is to pay for the balance of the time. That is the whole case.

Mr. JONES, of Ohio. Just wait a moment. I am going to talk about the second account. In October, 1864, the society made out an account for the balance of the rent due, and that was $123. That was paid. That is what I mean to say. Who denies that?

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. EDEN. I move the committee rise for the purpose of closing debate.

Mr. FINLEY. The debate, as I understand, was limited by the House to forty minutes.

Mr. EDEN. The debate is now going on under the five-minute rule, and I move to rise to close all debate; the debate under the five-minute rule as well as the general debate.

Mr. FINLEY. Has not debate been exhausted on the pending amendments?

The CHAIRMAN. It has.

Mr. EDEN. Then let us have a vote. I withdraw my amendment to the amendment.

Mr. CONGER rose.

Mr. RICE, of Ohio. Let us have a vote.

The CHAIRMAN. Did the gentleman from Illinois withdraw his motion that the committee rise?

Mr. EDEN. I withdrew my amendment, but as my friend from Michigan desires to be heard, I will not insist on my motion that the committee rise. He hardly ever gets the floor and I am willing to give him a chance.

Mr. CONGER. The chairman of the committee says that I have obtained the chance—that he will give me the chance, and he says it with some feeling. I am sorry to see the chairman of the Committee on War Claims manifest any personal feeling about this matter.

Mr. EDEN. None on earth.

Mr. CONGER. I am sorry to see him manifest any such feeling.

Mr. EDEN. None at all, sir; none whatever.

Mr. CONGER. I am sorry to see him manifest it toward so old and good a friend as I have been to him. [Laughter.] I do not mind so much about it as regards myself, but I am sorry to see him manifest any feeling toward new members of the House.

Mr. EDEN. If I have said anything which my friend thinks showed any feeling toward him, I withdraw it. I did it unconsciously.

Mr. CONGER. But wait until I get done with it first. [Laughter.] The gentleman instead of discussing the merits of this bill, in a manner unusual for him and which from my great respect for him I sincerely regret to see, turns to personalities. He speaks of my connection with the Committee on War Claims. On another occasion he has highly commended me for the performance of my duties there. Now he says that this was before that committee in the last Congress and received unanimous consent—the assent of every member of that committee. I cannot think the gentleman means to misrepresent me and one or two other members of that committee. I cannot think that is intentional; it must have been a slip of the tongue, because the gentleman must remember we discussed it in committee very fully and I made some of the very remarks about agricultural societies charging for grounds in committee that I made here to-day in the House.

Mr. EDEN. Did the gentleman make a minority report?

Mr. CONGER. I did not make a minority report. Is it necessary a member shall make a minority report to show he is not in favor of a bill or that he does not agree with the rest of the committee in recommending a bill for passage?

Mr. EDEN. If the gentleman states he opposed it in committee I do not recollect it; but as a matter of course I accept his statement.

Mr. CONGER. I do say so.

Mr. EDEN. I will take the gentleman's statement, although I have no recollection of the fact.

Mr. CONGER. I dislike the gentleman to state things which go before the country in regard to my action which makes my action here inconsistent with what I do in committee.

Mr. EDEN. Let me say right here—

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. I wish to hear the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. CONGER. And I have only five minutes.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. We will hear the chairman by and by.

Mr. CONGER. The gentleman also said that I must have been a member of the Knights of the Golden Circle, and the gentleman from California wonders why I did not tell who they were. I respect the gentleman from California as a member on this floor too much to refer to him in that connection. [Laughter.] During some portion of the war, as I suppose, my friend was a loyal citizen of the United States. Believing as I do, from what I have heard, that he was so during most of the time, it did not become me to suggest there may have been a few days when he was wavering, and I will not do it. [Laughter.]

That is all I desire to say; first to set myself right in regard to not having joined the committee in a unanimous report for this bill in the last Congress, and to say, as a reason why I did not point out men here as having belonged to the Knights of the Golden Circle, when the gentleman from Illinois says I ought to know them, that they are considered by me so far by-gones that I will not wound the feelings of a great many gentlemen on that side of the House by pointing them out. [Laughter.]

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. SHELLEY. I rise to oppose the amendment. I am not a citizen of Indiana, and therefore cannot speak as to the loyalty or patriotism of these claimants. But from the records I find there was the One hundred and fortieth Regiment of Indiana Volunteers in the Federal Army; a fact which speaks very well for the devotion of the people of Indiana to the Federal cause.

As regards these claimants, their ground was not only occupied from day to day and from month to month, but their buildings were destroyed and the shade-trees all over the grounds were cut down and used for fire-wood. The property was absolutely destroyed and nothing was left except the grounds. This claim has been proven to my satisfaction. I have all the prejudices out of which might grow antagonism to this claim. While those troops were being drilled and organized on those grounds, I was in the confederate army, impelled by my convictions, the highest that control human action. I believed those men were wrong. And therefore I have to overcome all my prejudices to arrive at a disposition to pay this claim. But having done that, I come to the conclusion that it is a just and equitable claim, one that could be established in the courts of the country, one that ought to be paid, and I believe it would be downright repudiation for the Government to refuse to pay it.

Mr. LUTTRELL. I move to amend by striking out the last two words.

Now Mr. Chairman, my friend from Michigan [Mr. CONGER] has seen fit to attack my loyalty. I simply suggested that the gentleman seemed to know more of the Knights of the Golden Circle than any gentleman I had met before. I know nothing of them so far as I am concerned. But I want to say to the gentleman from Michigan that he and I belonged to the same regiment and the same company and were commanded by the same commander; we both stayed at home during the war, in the stay-at-home guards. We were willing to let our neighbors go and fight for the Union, and now he and I are standing here fighting our battles over again, the battles we did not fight during the war. [Laughter.] I will stake my loyalty with his. I shed as much blood during the war as he did. I shed it by keeping out of the way, as the gentleman from Michigan did. He never once responded to the call of his country; but he never lets an opportunity pass on which he can avail himself of hurling anathemas against the democratic party and declaring on all occasions that we on this side are disloyal. I want to say to the gentleman from Michigan that we will take our MORRISONS and McMAHONS and RICES and BRAGGS and WILLIAMSES and other Union soldiers on this side of the House and compare them with the brave men on your side that went out to battle for the Union and did not stay at home as you did. And I will say more, we will take the rebel soldiers that sit here and place them alongside your carpet-baggers that went South after the war.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. You are a carpet-bagger to the North.

Mr. LUTTRELL. No, sir; I am not that. I have stood by the Union all the days of my life. And I will never vote for one of those war claims till I am satisfied it is just.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. Did not the gentleman from California emigrate from the South to the North?

Mr. LUTTRELL. I emigrated from the South to the West. I worked my way across the Rocky Mountains.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. Why, then, may you not be called a carpet-bagger as well as those who went from the North to the South?

Mr. LUTTRELL. I am informed that the gentleman who now interrogates me himself emigrated from Massachusetts to New York, so that, according to his own showing, he, too, is a carpet-bagger. I will say to the gentleman that I went to California, being one of the first who landed on its golden shores. I believe I ran the first threshing-machine that went into operation in that country, and now propose to run a machine to thresh all those who staid at home during the war or doubt my loyalty.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. I found no fault with you. I am for encouraging such men, not abusing them.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York is not in order.

Mr. LUTTRELL. I am entirely against this kind of discussion. I believe it to be the duty of members upon this floor to deal with measures such as this on their merits and not go off on side issues. We are tired of them. Let us do the work of the people who sent us here; and if this bill has merits let us pass it and not go off on these political issues with a view to opening questions of the past. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"] I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. BAKER.]

Mr. FINLEY. I ask that the amendment be read.

The amendment was again read.

The question being taken, there were—ayes 32, noes 91.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. A quorum has not voted.

The CHAIRMAN. A quorum not having voted, the Chair will order tellers, and appoints the gentleman from Alabama, Mr. SHELLEY, and the gentleman from New York, Mr. TOWNSEND.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 32, noes 114.

So the amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. CALDWELL, of Tennessee. I move to strike out the enacting clause of the bill.

The question being taken, there were—ayes 91, noes 41.

Mr. EVANS, of Indiana. I make the point of order that a quorum has not voted.

The CHAIRMAN. A quorum not having voted, the Chair will order tellers, and appoints the gentleman from Tennessee, Mr. CALDWELL, and the gentleman from Illinois, Mr. EDEN.

The committee again divided, and the tellers reported—ayes 91, noes 45.

Mr. EDEN. I do not ask for further count. I do not insist on a quorum voting.

The report of the tellers having been announced from the Chair,

Mr. WHITE, of Pennsylvania, said: I make the point that a quorum has not voted.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois, the chairman of the Committee on War Claims, which reports this bill, announced that he would not insist on a quorum. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania insist?

Mr. WHITE, of Pennsylvania. I do.

The CHAIRMAN. The tellers will resume their places.

Mr. SHELLEY. I move that the committee rise.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman cannot move that the committee rise while the House is dividing. No quorum has yet voted, and the tellers will continue their count, for it is desired that a quorum shall be present and voting.

The tellers resumed their places, and the count was continued; and when concluded, the tellers reported—ayes 98, noes 54.

So the motion of Mr. CALDWELL, of Tennessee, was agreed to.

Mr. EDEN. I believe that under the rules it is necessary that the committee shall rise at once and report the action of the committee to the House.

The CHAIRMAN. That is the rule.

The committee then rose; and Mr. BLACKBURN having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. BEEBE reported that the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar had had under consideration the bill (H. R. No. 1894) for the relief of the Bartholomew County Agricultural Society of the State of Indiana, and had directed him to report it back, with the recommendation that the enacting clause be stricken out.

Mr. SPRINGER. I move that the House concur in the action recommended by the Committee of the Whole; and upon that motion I call the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered, and under the operation thereof the recommendation of the Committee of the Whole was concurred in and the enacting clause of the bill stricken out.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. RAINEY, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

A bill (H. R. No. 142) granting a pension to George McCoy;

A bill (H. R. No. 436) granting a pension to Adam Stinson;

A bill (H. R. No. 467) restoring the name of Thomas Crawford, a soldier of the Mexican war, to the pension-roll;

A bill (H. R. No. 1948) granting a pension to Bridget T. Hopper; and

A bill (H. R. No. 2516) granting a pension to Fannie E. Records, widow of Albert B. Records, late a private in Company G, Fifteenth Regiment Maine Volunteers.

Mr. BRIGHT. I move that the House now resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. Pending that motion I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. BANNING. And pending the motion just made by the gentleman from New York [Mr. TOWNSEND] I move that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet on Monday next.

Mr. WOOD. Oh, I hope not.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Pending these two motions the Chair will lay before the House applications for leave of absence.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted—

To Mr. ROBERTS, for three days; and

To Mr. MACKAY, for two days.

The question was then put on Mr. BANNING's motion; and on a division there were—ayes 115, noes 56.

Mr. PRICE and others called for the yeas and nays.

The question was put upon ordering the yeas and nays, and 26 voted therefor.

Mr. CONGER. I insist upon a count of the other side.

The other side was counted, and there were 26 in the affirmative and 139 in the negative.

Mr. CONGER. I call for tellers on the yeas and nays.

Tellers were not ordered, only 23 members voting therefor.

So the yeas and nays were not ordered; and the motion of Mr. BANNING was agreed to.

Mr. BANNING moved to reconsider the vote by which the House agreed to adjourn over until Monday next; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The question recurred upon the motion of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. TOWNSEND,] that the House do now adjourn; and the question being put, there were—ayes 97, noes 59.

Mr. GOODE and Mr. HOOKER called for tellers.

The question was put upon ordering tellers; and 26 members voted in the affirmative.

Mr. HOOKER. Upon this question I must demand the yeas and nays.

The question was put upon ordering the yeas and nays, and 27 members voted therefor, not one-fifth of the last vote.

So the yeas and nays were not ordered; and the motion of Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York, was agreed to.

And accordingly (at three o'clock and thirty-five minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until Monday.

INDEX TO REVISED STATUTES.

Mr. CHRISTIANCY. I am directed by the Committee on the Revision of the Laws to report a bill requiring the commissioner for preparing and publishing a new edition of the Revised Statutes of the United States to revise and perfect the index to the first volume of the same. It is a bill which I think will meet the unanimous concurrence of the Senate, and there is great reason for its speedy passage, as the book is now in process of printing. I ask unanimous consent of the Senate to have the bill taken up now and acted upon.

The bill (S. No. 1014) requiring the commissioner for preparing and publishing a new edition of the Revised Statutes of the United States to revise and perfect the index to the first volume of the same was read twice, and considered as in Committee of the Whole. It makes it the duty of the commissioner appointed under the act approved March 2, 1877, to revise and perfect the index to the new edition of volume 1 of the Revised Statutes mentioned in that act, under the direction of the Secretary of State, and it appropriates sufficient money for the necessary expenses thereof, including such reasonable additional compensation to the commissioner for this service as shall be allowed by the Secretary of State.

Mr. COCKRELL. I understand the bill increases the expenditures necessary to complete this work.

Mr. CHRISTIANCY. It simply provides for such additional expense as may be necessary in revising the index of the volume as it now stands.

Mr. COCKRELL. Was it not contemplated in the original act that the commissioner should do that as part of the work?

Mr. CHRISTIANCY. All the rest of the work was included in the $5,000 given to the commissioner; but by the original act he was not required to revise the index.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I hope my friend from Missouri will not object to considering the bill at this time. I generally object myself when the consideration of a bill is asked upon being reported from a committee; but my attention was called to this matter accidentally four or five days ago, at which time I learned that the volume itself, which is only the first volume of the general statutes and not the District of Columbia volume, is entirely completed and is going through the press. I made inquiry respecting the index. The Senator knows, as everybody does, that the present index is altogether bad. I learned to my surprise that the commissioner and the Secretary of State had come to the opinion that the commissioner was not authorized to revise and perfect the old index, and that it had not been done; and on looking at the statute, that did not appear to have been named. It seemed to me that it would be a very great injury to everybody to have this new and permanent edition of the first volume put forth with an index so utterly insufficient as the present one. Therefore I suggested to the honorable chairman of the Committee on the Revision of the Laws to have an act like this bill provided, so that immediately the index could be perfected and the volume would be complete when we get it.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

FREEDMEN'S HOSPITAL.

Mr. EATON. I am directed by the Committee on Appropriations, who were instructed to investigate the management of the Freedmen's Hospital, to present its unanimous report, which I ask may be printed, and I move that the committee be discharged from the further consideration of the subject.

The motion was agreed to.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

No. 1016) to provide for the distribution of the awards made under the convention between the United States of America and the Republic of Mexico, concluded on the 4th day of July, 1868; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. EDMUNDS asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1018) to create the office and define the duties of consulting naturalist and to regulate his appointment, pay, &c.; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Agriculture.

He also asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1019) for the relief of Francis M. Stroug and Thomas Ross; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Patents.

Mr. EDMUNDS asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a joint resolution (S. R. No. 22) providing for a place of deposit for the records and proceedings of the commission appointed under the act entitled "An act to provide for and regulate the counting of votes for President and Vice-President and the decision of questions arising thereon for the term commencing March 4, A. D. 1877," approved January 29, 1877; which was read the first time.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Ordinarily I should ask for the present consideration of the joint resolution, as it merely provides for the secretary of the commission, Mr. McKenney, the assistant clerk of the Supreme Court, transmitting these records to the Secretary of State, where they ought to be kept; but I am so much opposed to hasty legislation that I merely ask now that the joint resolution be read a second time and placed on the Calendar, and I will ask that it be taken up to-morrow. It is not necessary, I presume, to refer it to any committee.

The joint resolution was read the second time by its title and ordered to be placed on the Calendar.

Mr. ANTHONY asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1020) to provide for the sale of extra copies of public documents and for the distribution of the regular official editions thereof; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Printing.

Mr. McMILLAN asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1021) for the relief of certain settlers on the public lands; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. HARRIS asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1022) limiting the time within which claims may be prosecuted against, and suits brought by, the United States; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1023) to remove the political disabilities of John H. Moore; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. McPHERSON (by request) asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1024) to correct the revision of the laws of the United States; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Revision of the Laws.

Mr. WALLACE asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1025) for the payment of compensation to Edward S. Oflley, late consul to Smyrna, Turkey, for judicial services rendered; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. McCREERY asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1026) granting a pension to Ben Alsop; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. INGALLS (by request) asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1027) to levy a tax on the sale of spirituous and malt liquors in bar-rooms and all places where intoxicants are sold by the drink in the District of Columbia; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. MATTHEWS asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 1028) declaratory of the law relating to descents and inheritance in the District of Columbia in certain cases; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. MATTHEWS. I am not certain whether the bill ought to go to the Committee on the Judiciary or to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair will refer it according to the wishes of the Senator.

Mr. MATTHEWS. The bill contemplates an inquiry into the state of the law in this District and changes it. I think perhaps it had better go to the Committee on the District of Columbia now.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

NEW YORK POST-OFFICE BUILDING.

Mr. CONKLING submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be instructed to inquire for what purposes the post-office building in the city of New York may lawfully be used, and whether any occupation of said building exists or is proposed not authorized; and meanwhile the Secretary of the Treasury is requested to take no action in regard to the occupation of said building until said committee shall report.

VACANCIES IN THE NAVY.

Mr. EDMUNDS submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Navy be, and he hereby is, directed to report to the Senate the number of vacancies existing in the naval establishment above the grade of captain, with the dates when such vacancies occurred; and whether examinations for promotions to such vacancies have been had, and whether in any case re-examinations have been directed or had in respect of any such promotions, and if so under what circumstances and authority of law.

REVISION OF PATENT LAWS.

Mr. BOOTH submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Printing:

Ordered, That 1,000 extra copies of the arguments on the bill to amend the statutes in relation to patents, before the Senate and House Committees on Patents, be printed for the use of the Senate Committee on Patents.

RECOMMITTAL OF A BILL.

On motion of Mr. HARRIS, it was Ordered, That the bill (S. No. 532) to incorporate the Suburban Railway Company of Washington, in the District of Columbia, be recommitted to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

REPORT ON RAILWAY MAIL TRANSPORTATION.

On motion of Mr. FERRY, it was Ordered, That the report of the special commission on railway mail transportation be referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

GROUND'S ALONG OLD CANAL.

Mr. WINDOM. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the joint resolution (H. R. No. 142) making an appropriation for filling up, draining, and placing in good sanitary condition the grounds south of the Capitol, along the line of the old canal, and for other purposes.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution.

Mr. WINDOM. I will say before the Secretary reports the joint resolution that I am instructed by the Committee on Appropriations to withdraw the amendment reported by it, so that unless some Senator desires to hear the amendment, let merely the original resolution be read.

The Chief Clerk read the joint resolution, as follows:

Resolved, etc. That the sum of $15,000 be, and the same is hereby, appropriated, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the purpose of employing the poor of the District in the work of filling up, draining, and placing in good sanitary condition the grounds south of the Capitol, along the line of the old canal. The commissioners of the District shall determine the plan of said work, shall see that it is properly conducted, and shall disburse the money: Provided, that a further appropriation be, and is hereby, made of the sum of $5,000, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the purpose of providing medical attendance, medicine, and food for the sick and infirm poor of the District, and that the same shall be disbursed under the direction of the commissioners of the District of Columbia.

Mr. EDMUNDS. What are the amendments reported by the committee?

Mr. WINDOM. Let the amendment be reported.

The CHIEF CLERK. The Committee on Appropriations reported an amendment to strike out all after the resolving clause and to insert:

That the sum of $25,000 be, and the same is hereby, appropriated, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the purpose of filling up, draining, and improving the sanitary condition of the grounds south of the Capitol, along the line of the old canal, under the supervision and direction of the commissioners of the District of Columbia, who shall determine the plan of said work, see that it is properly conducted, disburse the money, and, as far as practicable in the execution of said work, give employment to the most destitute and deserving poor of the District.

SEC. 2. That a further appropriation be, and is hereby, made of the sum of $5,000, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the purpose of providing medical attendance, medicine, and food for the sick and infirm poor of the District, and that the same shall be disbursed under the direction of the commissioners of the District of Columbia.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment, the Chair understands, is withdrawn by direction of the committee.

Mr. COCKRELL. Let us understand that.

Mr. WINDOM. I desire to state that the Committee on Appropriations tions have instructed me to ask to withdraw the amendment, or to move to reject the amendment, as far as we can, simply for the reason that the amendment would make no change in substance, being a mere change in form, and its adoption would probably postpone the passage of the joint resolution several days, when there is urgent necessity for its speedy passage.

Mr. COCKRELL. I desire to ask the Senator who reported this resolution if the object is simply to give employment to the poor of the District?

Mr. WINDOM. No; it is not.

Mr. COCKRELL. That is stated in the joint resolution to be the object.

Mr. WINDOM. The purpose of the joint resolution is to perform a very valuable work, one which is necessary for the sanitary condition of the city, and which will incidentally give employment to the destitute poor of the District in doing the work. That is the object. I am free to say that the amendment proposed by the Senate Committee on Appropriations expresses the idea, in my judgment, better, and I think would meet the views of the Senate better; but at the same time it would postpone the passage of the joint resolution probably a week or two weeks, and there is an urgent necessity that this employment be given now. The work may be done as well now as at any other time, and it would do much greater benefit now than two weeks hence. Therefore the committee thought it better to waive the technical objections to the resolution as it came from the House and have it passed to-day.

Mr. COCKRELL. We have in the State that I have the honor in part to represent a great many persons who desire employment. If this resolution is to have expressed upon its face that it is to be passed for the purpose of employing the poor of the District in work, I desire to offer an amendment to include an appropriation for the State of Missouri for her poor, who are just as worthy and deserving as the poor here. I do not think we have any right to make any such appropriation for the object contemplated by this joint resolution.

Mr. WINDOM. Mr. President—

Mr. BECK. Will the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations allow me to say a word?

Mr. WINDOM. Certainly.

Mr. BECK. The Senate Committee on Appropriations were unanimously of opinion that the language used by us was better than that which came from the House, but the chairman has very well stated that we do not want to delay the passage of the joint resolution, and therefore, as there was nothing seriously objectionable to it as it came from the House except its phraseology, we agreed to withdraw the amendment and adopt the joint resolution as it passed the House.

I wish to say to the Senator from Missouri that ever since the new canal has been made (and I spent four hours going all over it the other day carefully) the old canal has been left until it is perhaps the worst place in the city of Washington for producing malaria. It is right south of the Capitol, where the winds that prevail blow into this very building three-fourths of the time. The tide comes in there and it leaves débris of all sorts, until it is making this portion of the city, especially around the Capitol, more unhealthy than it ever was. A body of men, actuated by philanthropic motives, employed the poor of the District at fifty cents a day to fill up a portion of that canal, and they spent twelve hundred and odd dollars in doing it. Any Senator can go on the south side of the Capitol and see the amount of work which was done, and he will see that it has been simply wonderful for that amount of money; but there were men who did not want to beg and who could not get employment and were willing to work for half a dollar a day.

They did the work faithfully and have closed up one of the worst portions of the old canal. Still, for nearly half a mile, the same thing is repeated. Every time the tide ebbs and flows, all that produces malaria rises from it. The Committee on Appropriations believed that it was far better to give employment to that class of men than to make appropriations to beggars, or to establish soup-houses, or to support lazzaroni hanging around the Capitol dependent upon charity. There are hundreds of men to-day who do not want to beg, who are willing to work for half a dollar a day, and who will improve this property and improve the sanitary condition of the city of Washington beyond any amount that can be spent in any other way. Besides, it is all our own property. It is a Government reservation, known as the "mint reservation." There are over five acres of it, which, when filled up and leveled, can be sold for twenty times the amount of this appropriation. There is no job in it. It is not helping any private citizen; it is not appropriating money for work on any private man's property, but it would improve the health of the District, improve our own property, and do what we ought to do, at the same time giving employment to men in a District over which we have absolute control and where there are very many poor brought here and who hang around the capital because the Government is here.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. It was made by us.

Mr. BECK. Certainly, that canal was made by ourselves; the Holland bonds, I believe, were taken up by ourselves, and we own all the property. I do not believe this case is analogous at all to the poor of Missouri. There are poor everywhere, but here is not only a perfectly legitimate work, but a thing that ought to be done, and at the same time it will give relief to poor men who are willing to labor eight hours a day (for that is all they are required to work) for fifty cents, and doing an immense work for the city and the Government. It seems to me that we ought not to delay the measure one hour; and therefore, defective as the language of the House resolution is, it is far better to pass it in that form than that we should lose a day or an hour in doing the work.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ADVERTISING MAIL-LETTINGS.

Mr. FERRY. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 3987) to regulate the advertising of mail-lettings. The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

Mr. FERRY. Mr. President, I will not take up time in the morning hour to explain the bill. It is short, simple, and explains itself. The object of it is to simplify and economize the cost of publishing the notices of mail-lettings; also to prohibit the subcontracting of mail contracts unless with the consent of the Postmaster-General; and further to regulate the price to be paid newspapers for the publication of such lettings. The present law of February 26, 1853, has received two constructions. It provides for the publication and payment of orders and notices at forty cents per folio. Under the then Attorney-General it was held by him that it applied simply to judicial notices and orders, and not to the Post-Office Department publications. The present Attorney-General, however, has since the contract of last spring ruled that it applies to all departmental notices. The Post-Office Department is in the predicament to-day of having made a contract under the usual construction of the statute and being unable to settle with the publishers, as they refuse to receive pay under the late construction of the old law of 1853. That act was passed at a time when publishing rates were lower, and the papers at this time cannot afford and will not publish at those low rates.

The law also requires that at the seat of government in each State a paper shall publish the notices, and it was found that in two States, to wit, Kentucky and Alabama, there were no papers willing to publish at these rates. Section 3 of the pending bill provides that it shall be at the commercial rates such as individuals pay.

I think now by the reading of the bill it will explain itself with what I have said.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be reported at length.

The bill was read.

The bill was reported by the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, with amendments.

The first amendment reported by the committee was after the word "contract," in line 3 of section 1, to strike out "other than those accepted by law for carrying the mails in any State or Territory, the Postmaster-General shall cause to be published in one or more, not exceeding ten, newspapers published in such State or Territory," and insert:

For inland mail transportation other than by railroads and steamboats, except for temporary service, as provided for in an act approved August 11, 1876, amendatory of subsections 246 and 251 of an act approved June 23, 1874, the Postmaster-General shall cause to be published in not exceeding ten newspapers published in the State or Territory in which such service is to be let.

Mr. FERRY. Before the Senate agrees to that amendment I desire to make a correction which has been omitted. After "251" I move to add "of section 12;" so as to read:

Amendatory of subsections 246 and 251 of section 12.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be so modified.

The amendment, as modified, was agreed to.

The next amendment was to amend section 2 so as to make it read:

Hereafter no subletting or transfer of any such contract shall be permitted without the consent in writing of the Postmaster-General; and whenever it shall come to the knowledge of the Postmaster-General that any contractor has sublet or transferred his contract, except with the consent of the Postmaster-General as aforesaid, the same shall be considered as terminated, and the service shall be again advertised, as herein provided for.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I wish to call the attention of the Senator from Michigan to the possible effect and what I think is the natural legal effect of this second section. If the contractor, who is prohibited from subletting except with the consent of the Postmaster-General, does sublet, the section proceeds to state that the contract shall be considered as terminated and the service again advertised for, &c. Now, if a contractor found that he was not making as much profit as he thinks he would like to make, all he would have to do under that section would be, although it is a four years' contract, after he had gone on for three months or a year, to sublet his contract. The statute then says that that subletting shall terminate it, which means in my opinion a legal termination, and his bond is no longer binding against him for damages for not fulfilling that contract. It would be equivalent, therefore, to allowing every contract to be terminated at the option of the contractor by the simple device of his subletting to some one else.

Mr. FERRY. The Senator from Vermont does not lose sight of the fact that that must be secured "with the consent of the Postmaster-General."

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is the very point I am commenting upon, that the subletting is prohibited, as it ought to be, without the consent in writing of the Postmaster-General; and then it says that whenever it shall come to the knowledge of the Postmaster-General that any contractor has sublet or transferred his contract, except with the consent of the Postmaster-General, the same shall be considered as terminated. That is, the very fact of a subletting without the consent of the Postmaster-General terminates the contract, and that terminates all liability of the contractor, as matter of law, I think, with it.

I move to amend, being friendly to the object in view, by striking out in the eighth line the word "terminated" and in the ninth line the word "shall" and inserting in the place of "terminated" the word "violated" and in the place of the word "shall" the word "may," so that this subletting without the consent of the Postmaster-General shall be considered as a violation of the contract, which shall authorize the Postmaster-General if he chooses to proceed to advertise again, and then I should be glad to add "and that the bond of the contractor shall be held for any damages to the United States by the same."

Mr. FERRY. It would be well to have that added if it is subject to that abuse. I cannot accept it for the committee, but I presume there will be no objection to the amendment proposed, followed by the other amendment suggested by the Senator from Vermont.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Now I move to add at the end of the section "And the contractor and his sureties shall be liable on their bond for any damages resulting to the United States in the premises."

Mr. FERRY. I see no objection to that.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FERRY. Before the Senate agrees to the amendment of the committee, as amended, in line 3 the word "such" should be stricken out and "mail" inserted; so as to read:

Hereafter no subletting or transfer of any mail contracts shall be permitted.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment, as amended, was agreed to.

The next amendment of the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads was to insert as an additional section the following:

SEC. 3. Hereafter, when any person or persons being under contract with the Government of the United States for carrying the mails, shall sublet any such contract or employ any other person or persons to perform the service by such contractor agreed to be performed, or any part thereof, he or they shall file in the office of the Second Assistant Postmaster-General a copy of his or their contract; and thereupon it shall be the duty of the Second Assistant Postmaster-General to notify the Auditor of the Treasury for the Post-Office Department of the fact of the filing in his office of such contract. Said notice shall embrace the name or names of the original contractor or contractors, the number of the route or routes, the name or names of the subcontractor or subcontractors, and the amount agreed to be paid to the subcontractor or subcontractors. And upon the receipt of said notice by the Auditor of the Treasury for the Post-Office Department, it shall be his duty to retain, out of the amount due the original contractor or contractors, the amount stated in said notice as agreed to be paid to the subcontractor or subcontractors, and shall pay said amount, upon the certificate of the Second Assistant Postmaster-General, to the subcontractor or subcontractors, under the same rules and regulations now governing the payments made to original contractors: Provided, That upon satisfactory evidence that the original contractor or contractors have paid off and discharged the amount due under his or their contract to the subcontractor or subcontractors, it shall be the duty of the Second Assistant Postmaster-General to certify such fact to the Auditor of the Treasury for the Post-Office Department; and thereupon said Auditor shall settle with the original contractor or contractors, under the same rules as are now provided by law for such settlements.

Mr. FERRY. Before agreeing to this amendment I move to insert after the word "shall" in line 3 the word "lawfully;" so as to read "shall lawfully sublet any such contract."

The amendment, as amended, was agreed to.

Mr. SARGENT. I should like to inquire if you do not want to use the word "lawfully" before "employ" in line 3 for the same reason.

Mr. FERRY. That is understood, but I have no objection to inserting that word.

Mr. SARGENT. It will not be understood unless it is inserted, though I suppose that is the meaning.

Mr. FERRY. That is the meaning. There is no objection to inserting the word.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The word will be inserted.

The next amendment of the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads was to insert as section 4 the following:

SEC. 4. Hereafter all advertisements, notices, proposals for contracts, and all other forms of advertising required by law for the executive and judicial departments of the Government may be paid for at a price not to exceed the commercial rates charged to private individuals; but the heads of departments, or their authorized agents, may secure lower terms at special rates whenever the public interest requires it.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to insert as section 5:

SEC. 5. All newspapers or other publications in which said advertising shall be inserted shall file with each Department a certificate of their commercial rates as aforesaid, and all accounts against the United States for advertising shall be audited and paid at a rate not to exceed such certified rates on file: Provided, That all advertising in newspapers since the 10th day of April, 1877, shall be audited and paid at like rates.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to insert as section 6:

SEC. 6. All laws or parts of laws inconsistent with this act are hereby repealed.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FERRY. In line 36 of section 1, I move to strike out the word "said" and insert "miscellaneous;" so as to read:

And no other advertisement of miscellaneous lettings shall be required.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FERRY. I have another amendment. I offer the following to come in as section 6, changing the present section 6 to section 7.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be reported.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to insert, as section 6, the following:

When for any cause it may become necessary to make a new contract for carrying the mails upon any water-route between ports of the United States upon which mail service has previously been performed, the Postmaster-General may contract with the owner or master of any steamship, steamboat, or other vessel plying upon the waters or between ports of the United States for carrying the mail upon said route for any length of time not exceeding four years, and without advertising for proposals therefor, whenever the public interest and convenience will thereby be promoted; but the price paid for such service shall in no case be greater than the average price paid under the last preceding or then existing regular contract upon the same route. And the Postmaster-General may contract with the owners or masters of steamships, steamboats, or other vessels plying upon the waters or between ports of the United States for carrying the mails upon such routes where no mail service has previously been performed, without advertising for proposals therefor; but no contract for such new service shall be for a longer time than one year.

No contract for carrying the mails between the United States and any foreign port shall be for a longer time than two years, unless otherwise directed by Congress.

So much of sections 3943, 3956, and 3970 of the Revised Statutes as is in conflict with the preceding section is hereby repealed.

Mr. FERRY. The object of this section is simply to harmonize conflicting features of present law and make it more certain. According to the sections that are referred to, the present law permits contracts to be made for one year, two years, and less than four years, and they necessarily are in conflict with each other. The Postmaster-

General in one case has contracted for two years' service upon the water, when there is a law apparently prohibiting the making of a contract for more than one year. Which law shall guide him? This provides that all contracts on the water, where service has previously existed, shall be for not exceeding four years between ports of the United States, and for service to foreign ports shall be for two years, and for new service between United States ports shall be for but one year.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SARGENT. I should like to ask the Senator who reports the bill if he has considered that the effect of sections 2 and 3 may be to restrain competition very much in bidding for the carrying of the mail. I understand that some objections arise from the fact that persons located in a particular place bid for the carriage of the mails all over the country, and very frequently do it dishonestly, and cause complications which it is the purpose of this legislation to reform. Furthermore, that these persons sometimes contract with subcontractors and do not pay for the last quarter. The subcontractors have no means to recover that amount from the Treasury, it being taken by the fraudulent original contractor. Now, while those things are true and ought to be remedied, and perhaps this legislation does do so, I should like to ask if the committee have sufficiently considered whether by providing that there shall be no subcontracting except by leave of the Postmaster-General and under the close limitations made by this bill we may not find that only those persons will bid who are actually carrying the mails on the routes advertised for and have old stock. There is not much time between the advertising and the route going into service finally, and if men find they have got to carry the mails themselves or else bid under fear that they cannot subcontract, may they not be deterred from bidding, and the result be an increased cost of the mail service?

Mr. FERRY. I apprehend the object of the Senator in his allusion is not only to provide for publication and the rights of contractors, but also to secure the interest of the Government.

This does not conflict at all with that. It only interferes with the irregular practice of irresponsible parties taking contracts. If they find they are paying contracts, they execute them, and when otherwise they fail to fulfill them. The Senator will see by section 3 that subcontractors are protected, while under existing law they are not protected because under present statute the contractor is paid for the service whether he has one subcontractor or a dozen, and they have no remedy whatever except the fidelity of the contractor.

Mr. SARGENT. I think that part of the bill is very good.

Mr. FERRY. This bill provides that on the contract being sublet and the subcontractor filing a copy of the contract with the Second Assistant Postmaster-General and he notifying the Auditor of the Treasury for the Post-Office Department, the pay to the subcontractor is made certain and cannot be diverted. It is taken out of the proceeds due the contractor, and cannot be obtained except upon filing evidence that he has paid in full the subcontractor.

Now, so far as the publication is concerned, I think, on the examination of the bill a little further than the Senator has perhaps given to it, he will see that the publication has been broadened. Under the present law, for general service all publication is prohibited except by posting up schedules of the routes in the several post-offices of the United States. In addition to that this bill provides for these notices to be given in from one to ten newspapers, instead of one to five under present law, so that instead of curtailing publicity it has enlarged publicity and gives the public more knowledge of the desire on the part of the Government to make contracts for the mail service.

The bill was reported to the Senate, as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended by adding the words "and for other purposes."

ADMISSIONS TO THE FLOOR.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair desires to state that many Senators have called his attention to the daily violation of the sixtieth rule of the Senate, regulating the matter of admissions to the floor of the Senate. He now enjoins upon all officers of the Senate charged with that duty the strict enforcement of this rule, and he asks of Senators to co-operate with him to that end.

The bill (H. R. No. 1189) to extend the time one year for presenting the claims of Dakota volunteer forces, as examined and reported upon by General Hardie, under the special act of Congress approved February 20, 1874, to the proper accounting officers for approval and payment, and the bill (H. R. The bill (H. R. No. 2401) to authorize the claimants to certain lands in Santa Barbara County, California, to submit their claim to the United States district court for that State for adjudication was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

THE PACIFIC RAILROADS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. No. 15) to alter and amend the act entitled "An act to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from the Missouri River to the Pacific Ocean, and to secure to the Government the use of the same for postal, military, and other purposes," approved July 1, 1862, and also to alter and amend the act of Congress approved July 2, 1864, in amendment of said first-named act, the pending question being on the amendment submitted by Mr. MATTHEWS.

Mr. BECK. Mr. President, some days ago I requested the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. THURMAN,] the member of the Judiciary Committee in charge of this bill, to allow me a little time in which to present my views upon it. I confess the more I have examined the question, the more I have become satisfied that there is but little use and not much propriety in my speaking at all. The question seems to me so plain and the bill of the Judiciary Committee so moderate in its requirements and so just, that I can hardly discuss it. Still, as it is a matter of very great importance and as the precedent we are about to establish may be regarded hereafter as a guide to future Congresses, I desire to say a few words in relation to it. My argument will be based on three or four propositions, which are substantially as follows:

First. It being conceded that we are large creditors of the railroad companies, will our debt and interest be secure and will it be paid when due if we stand where we are under existing laws and do nothing?

Second. Are the railroad companies able, without serious embarrassment to the corporations, to secure our debt, if they are required to begin now to create a sinking fund for that purpose? And Third. Are they making or proposing to make any effort to secure the payment of their debts? If not, and our debt is in danger, have we either by virtue of our inherent authority or under our agreement with them any other feasible plan except that proposed by the Judiciary Committee, which bill I propose to sustain?

I think, Mr. President, in whatever else Senators differ, there is no disagreement as to the justice of our debt, the solemn assurances given by the companies that it should be repaid with interest, the certainty that they never would have received the money or any part of it but for those assurances, and the equities which the tax-payers of the country have to demand of us, as their trustees, that it should, if possible, be secured, so that when due it may be collected and their burdens to that extent lightened. Nor is there any dispute as to the magnitude of the debt, at least up to a point which renders it conclusive that the first-mortgage bonds and the bonds of the Government will not only not be paid but that the companies do not intend to make any effort to pay them when due. In other words, the companies, while clamoring for the protection of what they call their vested rights, are wholly disregarding the vested rights of the people who have the debt and interest owing to them paid as it matures. I say vested right because although it is not payable now, the right to future payment is as certain as though it was. The first-mortgage bondholders do not care; the property will sell for enough to pay them, and therefore I am not speaking of or seeking to guard their rights. The directors and stockholders will take care that they themselves are the owners of those bonds long before they mature. There are net earnings enough to make that certain, and they can become the owners of the roads under sales to satisfy the first mortgage free from any of the embarrassment and limitations of the acts of 1862 and 1864. Their vested rights under such sales would perhaps then be entitled to respect.

To show that this is not an unreasonable apprehension of mine, I read from a report on this subject made by the Judiciary Committee of the last House of Representatives, which carefully considered the subject. The report is No. 440 of the first session of the Forty-fourth Congress. In that report that committee, speaking of the immense debt we hold against the railroads and what will become of it if we do not take steps to secure it, say:

To pay this, the Government may find only a worn-out road, which put up at auction would not pay the first-mortgage bonds. And if these should happen to be in the hands of those who now control the road, they would doubtless become the purchasers and sole owners, for the objection to a Government purchase would be so great it would never be made, and there could be no other competitor who would be formidable as a purchaser. If there could be danger of this, the managers of the road could permit the interest to accumulate on the first-mortgage bonds to any amount requisite to secure their purpose to become owners of the road without paying any of its debt to the Government. The necessity for prompt measures to secure the Government cannot be doubted.

We—and by that expression I mean we, the people, the tax-payers of the country—acting through our agents, the then Congress and President of the United States, two of the three co-ordinate branches of the Government, granted and gave many valuable rights and a vast domain to these companies, and to further aid them loaned the Union Pacific Railroad $27,326,000 and the Central and Western Pacific Railroads, now one company, $27,855,000 for thirty years, agreeing to pay the interest on our own bonds during that period. After allowing all the credits obtained and obtainable under existing laws from half the Government transportation and 5 per cent. of the net earnings of the roads, it is safe to say (waiving all question as to our right ultimately to receive interest on the payments of interest from the time it was paid) the companies will owe us in the year 1900, as stated by the Senator from Indiana, [Mr. McDONALD,] $122,305,000, of which the Union Pacific will owe over $55,000,000 and the Central and Western Pacific $67,000,000. If we are entitled, as the Attorney-General of the United States insists, to interest on the payments of interest from the time we paid it, the amount that will be due the people of the United States by these corporations will be $174,000,000. I do not well see how the legality of that claim can be denied; its equity cannot be. But waiving that, all agree (and I desire to base my argument on undisputed facts) that they will owe us $122,000,000. The companies and their friends insist upon their right to distribute all dividends or net earnings, up to the maturity of the bonds, among their stockholders, which means among themselves, free from any obligation to provide in advance for the payment of the debt thus maturing, even for the payment of any part of the principal of the first mortgage bonds, which, when due, will amount to $55,000,000. The two roads jointly own nineteen hundred miles of railway, so that our debt of $122,000,000 will alone be about $65,000 a mile on the whole line of the road, or at least $15,000 a mile more than it would cost now to build and equip a duplicate road and put it in good repair, which, of course, their roads will not be when the time of sale comes, especially if it is the interest of the managers to buy them in at a low price under the first mortgage bonds, no matter what steps we may take to interfere with them. They are masters of the art of delay. All they desire now is to get this controversy on their terms into the courts, and they are safe for at least five years, no matter how unjust or flimsy their defense may be. It must be apparent, therefore, from the admitted facts, that they, if let alone, mean to be hopelessly insolvent when our debt matures.

One of the recitals of the bill of the Judiciary Committee sets forth the facts as to their present condition very clearly in the following words:

Whereas the total liabilities (exclusive of interest to accrue) to all creditors, including the United States, of the said Central Pacific Company, amount in the aggregate to more than $26,000,000, and those of the said Union Pacific Railroad Company to more than $58,000,000.

Being an indebtedness now of nearly $100,000 a mile on their nineteen hundred miles of railroad. It did not need the confessions of Mr. Dillon and Mr. Huntington to convince any Senator of their purpose to be insolvent when our debt matures. A simple calculation proves it. Still I desire to make this proposition plain, as it is the foundation of my views, and I cannot state it better than by reading from the very able speech of the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. BAILEY] on this subject. He said:

In order that we may fully appreciate the danger that threatens the Government and people of the United States of losing the hundreds of millions of dollars advanced and to be advanced in building this great highway of commerce, I beg to call the attention of the Senate to an extract from a letter written by Mr. Dillon, president of the Union Pacific Railroad Company, on the 4th of February, 1875, addressed to Mr. Bristow, then Secretary of the Treasury, in which he says:

"The mortgage held by the Government, in its terms and by judicial decision of the United States circuit court, cannot be enforced until the maturity of the bonds, which is near the close of the present century.

"The bonds are accumulating an interest-account, also uncollectible until the principal is due. Principal and interest, when due, will amount to the very large aggregate of over $77,000,000."

And he is writing about the Union Pacific Railway indebtedness alone—

"Though the actual amount advanced by the Government was only $27,236,512.

"For this very large amount the Government has only a second mortgage, and if it be allowed to accumulate, without any provision being made to meet it, the company will probably be utterly unable to pay it.

"At the same time, it is equally manifest that the Government will be unable to collect it, except upon the assumption that it will advance the money to discharge prior mortgages, and run the road on Government account—a policy which wise statesmanship could not advise.

"By standing still, therefore, the company has a load of debt accumulating for which no provision is made, and the Government is drifting further and further from the opportunity to secure a just return for its advances. To do nothing is to injure both the Government and the company, perhaps irretrievably to both.

"In this dilemma, I venture to make a proposition which offers on the part of the company all it can possibly do, and secures to the Government a substantial return for its advances."

This intimation of probable insolvency of the Union Pacific Railroad Company, and consequent to a to the Government, is repeated in a communication addressed to the Senate Committee on the Judiciary on the 12th of November, 1877, by Mr. Dillon, and Mr. Huntington, the vice-president of the Central Pacific Railway, who joined with him in saying as to both companies what I will ask the indulgence of the Senate to listen to:

Nearly three years since the officers of the Union Pacific and Central Pacific Railroad Companies called the attention of the Secretary of the Treasury to the fact that contrary to the general expectation at the inception of the enterprise—

And I ask attention to this phraseology—

"a balance of accounts in his ledger was accumulating against them which, unless some remedial legislation was soon had, would amount, by the time it became due and payable, to a sum which it might be embarrassing to the companies to pay simultaneously with their first-mortgage debt, and greater than the value of the subordinated lien of the Government on the properties themselves."

But as if this deliberate declaration was not sufficient to warn the Senate of the danger that threatens, Mr. Huntington, who appeared before the Judiciary Committee, takes occasion to say in an address delivered to that committee:

"By the time"—

Speaking of the Government debt and the first-mortgage debt, equal in amount to the principal of the Government bonds issued to these railroad companies—

"By the time both mature and become payable it is not at all likely the property will be worth their aggregate sum, and if the shrinking and settling of prices should continue further it may happen that it will not suffice to pay more than the first mortgages."

These carefully considered statements are accompanied by equally well-considered declarations to the effect that by the terms of the acts of 1862 and 1864 the officers of the two companies have the moral as well as the legal right to distribute the earnings of the two roads to the stockholders, and although this course will certainly lead to the insolvency of the corporations, as they agree, they very plainly threaten that unless the Government will yield to their terms they will manage affairs solely with regard to the interests of the proprietors and without regard to the just claims of creditors.

It will be observed that Mr. Dillon assumes that the debt of the Union Pacific Railroad Company will be much greater than the Senator from Indiana [Mr. McDONALD] stated. The Senator from Indiana said it would be at least $55,000,000. Either statement is enough to justify my assertion as to the utter insolvency of the companies at the time our debt matures. I agree with both Mr. Dillon and Mr. Huntington in their statement that unless some remedial legislation is soon had, it may happen that it (the property of the roads) will not suffice to pay more than the first mortgage. I know, as they admit, that without some provision being made to meet our debt the companies will put it out of their power to pay it. I differ with both of them as to the necessary and proper remedial legislation to save the debt. I think the bill offered by the Committee on the Judiciary will give us a chance to do so; the bill submitted by the companies to the Senate is absolutely and certainly a substantial confiscation of it all. I cordially agree with Mr. Dillon that any attempt on the part of the Government to advance the money to discharge the prior mortgages and run the road on Government account is not only a policy which wise statesmanship could not advise, but would be destructive of all my ideas of republican government, and it is perhaps because they rely upon that being the view of members of Congress in the future that they are determined to push us to that contingency. They are willing to allow the first-mortgage bonds to accumulate, and make no provision for them, make no provision for the principal of our debt or for anything but a fraction of the interest on it, although they have solemnly obligated themselves to pay the principal and all the interest at maturity, which they confess they do not intend to do, admitting that without some remedial legislation it cannot be done, and substantially asserting that unless it is done they will not try to comply with their obligations. Their boldness and audacity commands a certain degree of respect; they seem to feel that they are strong enough to control or defy Congress, and their insolent avowal of a determination to disregard their obligations shows how confident they are of their power.

I am free to say that I would rather see all the debt and all the interest lost than to see this Government undertake to purchase the roads and become a great railroad manager. I will do nothing that will tend to bring about that contingency. We have centralization and consolidation and personal government enough—at least we have had it in the last few years—to warn us against that. I have seen this Government within the last ten years attempt to take possession of all the telegraph lines in the country. I have seen propositions before Congress to take Government control of all the railroad lines of the country and add another one hundred thousand to our one hundred thousand officials. Attach these great railroad lines to the Government and make them part of its political machinery and we will no longer have a Republic of coequal States; there will be Senators sitting on this floor by the dozen, the creatures of the Administration, whatever its politics may be, and of these railroad corporations, pledged to stand by them in all their contracts with the unorganized masses of tax-payers.

I read the other day in Mr. Spofford's book and was very much impressed with the wisdom of an article on this subject taken from a French journal, published in August, 1877. That country is making some efforts toward establishing a republican form of government, but is not as far advanced as we think we are. Speaking of government management of railroads, it uses arguments to my mind very forcible. After showing how private companies managed them, it said:

In the hands of the state, on the contrary, the railway falls into the jurisdiction of one of the ministers, and it is managed administratively. The state has to do with administration, and not with commerce.

In England and in Austria, where the railways are managed on the most commercial plan by the companies which own them, or which have obtained the charters, the commercial agents of these companies traverse the country to secure freights, just as the clerks of any merchant would travel to open up markets for the goods of their patron.

And then it proceeds to show how the Government will and can do none of these things.

Again:

One of the principles taught by political economy is that in the domain of labor, in that of industry and of commerce, the sphere of activity of the state begins nearly where the rôle of the individual ends, or where the activity of private industry ceases. Wherever, in the vast field of industrial action, individual efforts can be successfully applied, the government should leave free room to that agency, and not enter into competition with it.

Let it not be said that if the state effects, on the one hand, a lower price for transportation by railway, it may well, on the other hand, increase the tax upon the people, and that a compensation will be arrived at in that manner. This might be true if the increase of tax sustained by each citizen were proportionate to the use he made of the railway. Such a distribution of the taxes is impossible in practice, and it would happen that he who could make little or no use of the railway would pay the tax for him who constantly uses it, which would be a gross injustice. The state is obliged in fairness to impose such a tariff upon railway traffic as will enable it, by the aid of the profits realized, to pay for the capital invested in the railways which it works. What, then, becomes of the theory of those who hoped that the government, if it were to buy up all the railways, would carry for the public at the mere cost of working the road?

From the moment that the railways should become the property of the government and be managed by it they would become subject to political influence. The minister of the railways would find himself absolute master in questions which touch industry and commerce most intimately; he would dispose of one of the most considerable elements of national wealth—transportation; he would be chief of an army of functionaries scattered over the whole country, and in continual contact with the whole nation; the railways would pass very probably into the rôle of propaganda, or the means of yielding a pressure of political influence in the hands of the minister or of a majority of the legislative body. Who would occupy himself with the development of traffic, with the increase of receipts, with the curtailment of expenses, with the proper and economic use of the railway personnel? From that day, the railways would have lost their essential character. They would have ceased to be an industry, they would become only a bureau, and would constitute only one section of the more or less complicated machinery of the government.

I am thoroughly convinced of the wisdom and statesmanship of these views, and will never consent that this Government, even to save a debt however large, shall become a great railroad monopolist or engage in any such competition with its citizens.

For such reasons as are stated in that article, and they are very many, the railroad companies know that as long as there is a democratic representative left in either the Senate or House of Representatives, and there seem to be a good many of them coming here now, the Government will in no event purchase on its own account or take charge of these railroads; and if their managers can only put them in a shape where they can purchase them to satisfy the first-mortgage bonds and defeat the collection otherwise of our just debts, they will vest themselves with all these great corporate rights and powers upon their own terms because they know that we will never undertake to purchase or run these railroads on Government account.

Therefore, I assume that the first proposition I made is plain, which was, that we being creditors, with a large bona fide debt at the mercy of these corporations, must take some step as our debt is in imminent peril; the companies obviously do not intend to pay it; we cannot afford to buy and run the roads, even to save ourselves, and therefore something has to be done, or the debt will be lost. The next question is, are the railroad companies able, without serious embarrassment to the corporations, to make our debt secure. If they are not, then they might present some equity, and we might settle by some equitable adjustment; but I assert, and the proof shows, that they are fully able without sacrifice to pay every dollar they owe. I will not go into detail on that subject. I desire, however, to call attention of the Senate and put upon the record some facts which I think will satisfy every Senator that they are able to pay all their debts. I shall begin with extracts from the report of the Committee on the Judiciary which accompanies this bill, which report makes this part of the case clear and conclusive. It shows that the railroad companies, even admitting that they will not continue to make as much by \$2,000,000 as they have made during the last fiscal year, which they will surely exceed on the average hereafter, but upon the average receipts of the last four years can pay all their interest, pay dividends upon the nominal amount of their stock varying from $4\frac{1}{2}$ to 6 per cent., supply all the sinking fund that the bill of the Committee on the Judiciary requires, and carry on their business without embarrassment. The extracts from that report prove it. Every Senator, I presume is familiar with them. If not, he ought to be.

Speaking of the Union Pacific Railroad and its property the committee, among other things, say:

We have seen that, for the last four years, the average annual net income of the company, deducting operating expenses alone from its gross receipts, has been $6,547,149.91. We think that this income will be largely increased in the future by the increasing business of the company, the sales of its lands, and its immense coal-mines. In reference to these mines the report of the directors to the stockholders for 1874 says:

"The Union Pacific Railroad Company own, in Wyoming Territory, an area of coal-fields greater than the entire anthracite-coal fields of the State of Pennsylvania.

"The coal-fields of the company extend along four hundred miles of the road, and five million acres of its lands are within the coal measures. The coal is superior for ordinary fuel, and unequalled for making steam and for all manufacturing purposes.

"It will furnish cheap fuel to the company for its own traffic, and will afford large additional revenues from the sale and transportation of coal for domestic and manufacturing uses, to supply the country extending for nearly two thousand miles—from Omaha to the Pacific coast."

The coal from their mines cost them less than $1.30 per ton.

The Government directors, in their report to the Secretary of the Interior, furnish the following statement:

The earnings of the road for the year ending June, 30, 1877, show a considerable increase over the preceding year, and largely more than any other year in its history.

The gross earnings for the year ending June 30, 1877, were $13,719,343.82
For the year ending June 30, 1876 12,113,990.69

Increase for the year 1877 over 1876 1,605,353.13

Operating expenses, as claimed by company, for year 1876 5,447,819.27
For 1877 5,402,252.24

Gain for 1877 over 1876 45,567.03

Net earnings for the year 1877 8,317,031.58
Net earnings for the year 1876 6,666,171.42

Increase for 1877 over 1876 1,650,920.16

This is a surprising result, considering the general depression which has rested upon the business of the country, and fully justifies the opinion expressed in former reports by the Government directors relative to the immense possibilities of this road.

The committee, in their extreme caution, do not base their calculations on the earnings of last year, but on the average of years past, as the following table from their report shows:

Average annual gross receipts, less operating expenses, as ante	$6,547,149.91
Deduct interest on first mortgage	$1,633,920.00
Five per cent. on net earnings, payable to Government	245,661.00
One-half transportation, payable to Government under existing law, say	421,311.87
Interest on company's sinking fund bonds, 8 per cent. on $14,326,000	1,146,080.00
Interest on income bonds, 10 per cent. on $10,000	1,000.00
Interest on Omaha bridge bonds, 8 per cent. on $2,279,000	182,320.00
One-half transportation account to be paid into the sinking fund as per bill	421,311.87
Further sum to be paid to same as per bill	850,000.00
		4,901,604.74

Leaving for dividends among stockholders 1,645,545.17

Being about $4\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. on the nominal amount of the stock, or $6\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. on its present market value.

As to the Central Pacific Railroad Company, the committee in their report say:

The gross earnings of the road, less the operating expenses, for the years 1873 to 1876, both inclusive, as stated in the reports of the directors to the stockholders, were as follows:

1873	$6,952,361.73
1874	7,894,661.46
1875	8,342,898.78
1876	9,177,822.09
1876	9,137,004.73
Total for five years	41,504,828.77

Average annual net receipts 8,300,965.75

If we deduct the interest upon the first-mortgage bonds, as well as the operating expenses, from the gross receipts, the account of said five years would stand as follows:

Gross receipts, less operating expenses	$41,504,828.77
Deduct five years' interest on first-mortgage bonds, $1,671,340.50 \times 5	8,356,704.00
Net earnings for five years	33,148,124.77

Average annual net earnings 6,629,624.95

After showing what is required by the bill to be paid into the sinking fund, the committee add:

That the company can make these payments and have a surplus sufficient for handsome dividends to its shareholders is easily demonstrated from the facts already stated. But the same thing is shown more concisely by its statements of profit and loss in the directors' reports for 1875 and 1876 to the stockholders.

By the report for 1875 it appears that, after paying all expenses and interest, the company paid to its shareholders dividends amounting to 10 per cent. on the nominal amount of the stock—amount paid, $5,427,538—and it had a surplus of $10,305,953 left.

In 1876, after paying all expenses and interest, it paid dividends amounting to 8 per cent. on the nominal amount of the stock—amount paid, $4,342,040—and had a surplus of $10,255,292.75 left. If we take these two years as a guide for the future—and we think that we may safely do so—the annual amount that will be divided among the shareholders, should no sinking fund be created, will be 9 per cent. on the nominal value of the stock, $4,883,795.

If the bill we report become a law this amount would be diminished by the amount required to be paid into the sinking fund, say $1,400,000, leaving $3,483,795, after the payment of all expenses and interest and the payments into the sinking fund, to be divided among the shareholders, being 6.4 per cent. on the nominal value of their stock.

That is enough to prove my assertion that the companies are able to secure our debt without embarrassment, and being able every principle of justice requires that they should be compelled to do so.

The Secretary of the Interior, in his last report to Congress, he being the officer who is charged with the duty of having proper examination and report upon these subjects made, from pages 29 to 35 of his report to Congress not only shows that the companies will be insolvent, but that the money we have advanced and are obliged to pay will be lost unless some legislation is had and a sufficient sinking fund established. He gives a detailed statement of the earnings of the roads, the growth of their business, the value of their property. Among other things he says:

The Union Pacific Railroad Company and the Central Pacific Railroad Company did better than ever before in the year 1876, notwithstanding the fact that all other railroad companies suffered from the great depression of trade and industrial enterprise.

He takes from Poore's Manual, a standard authority on that subject, for 1877, these facts:

Gross earnings.....	$31,033,803
Operating expenses.....	14,000,286
Net earnings.....	17,033,517
Bonded interest, paid.....	$6,612,215
Eight per cent. dividend on stock.....	7,299,000
	13,911,215
Surplus.....	3,121,702

Leaving a surplus after doing all that of $3,121,702. He then contrasts them with all other roads of the country and he shows conclusively that if they are required to lay aside a reasonable portion (and surely the portion required by the Judiciary Committee bill is a reasonable one) they can so far reduce that debt as to make it a very light burden upon them when the debt becomes due, one that this Government would be glad to extend after they had in good faith put themselves in such shape as to show that they were honestly trying to pay it. The necessity for this legislation now is that they are not honestly trying to lay up any fund to secure us, and they are defying our authority to require them to do it and are avowing that they do not intend to make even an effort to secure us, and still they are crying out loudly for "good faith" and "vested rights!" Good faith to the people who have borne all the burdens which have enriched them forms no part of their code of morals. I hope it will be regarded by their representatives here.

We have commissioners appointed to examine the condition of the Union Pacific Railroad. They are required by law to make a report to the Secretary of the Interior. They have done so, and they show that absolute insolvency, if the present course of these railroad directors is allowed to continue, is staring them in the face, though they are receiving such vast earnings. The commissioners, among many other things that I might read bearing upon the questions now before us, because they urge in every form the importance and absolute necessity of congressional legislation for the protection of our debt, say:

There ought to be no conflict between the United States and the owners of the road. There is no just reason why there should be. The United States advanced the bonds in the sum named, and has paid and is still paying the interest thereon. This is a debt which ought to be paid, but under the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States it will not become due until the maturity of the bonds, thirty years from the date of their issue. To let it run on, accumulating to the end of this time, will be the worst possible policy and ruinous at last. If a just accommodation can be arrived at, for the avoidance of this result, it would be wise for all the parties concerned to avail themselves of it.

They make calculations and exhibits as to the sinking fund required, which are substantially those made in the Judiciary Committee report. They add:

During the year covered by this report the company continued its policy of paying quarterly dividends of 2 per cent., making 8 per cent. per annum. In the report for 1876 this subject was referred to in the following language, namely: "The Government directors have not approved the dividend policy of the company. They have held that the amounts heretofore claimed as due to the Government on reimbursement account, under the several provisions of law establishing and regulating the same, should be regularly paid before the declaration of dividends." This position is here reaffirmed.

They show that large sums are taken from the earnings of these roads to the detriment of the Government and the diminution of its security to aid other railroads, such as the Utah Central, Utah Southern, Utah Northern, Republican Valley, and Colorado Central Railroads, while still others are in contemplation. But I have not time to dwell longer on this branch of the subject.

It must be borne in mind that the dividends I have spoken of are made on the nominal value of the stock, which in the Union Pacific amounts to $36,762,300, in the Central Pacific to $54,275,500, much the larger portion of which they never paid in any form thirty-three cents on the dollar for; stock, 66 per cent. of which in the Union Pacific Company, it is stated by the reports of the House committee, represented nothing but the fraud of the Credit Mobilier and other like frauds. I do not wish to make any statement on that subject except by authority. The Judiciary Committee of the House of Representatives, whose report I hold in my hand, say on page 21:

From this it will be seen these companies, on their own showing, are making large profits, and are abundantly able to pay and indemnify the Government against future loss, and pay liberal dividends besides on the par value of stock which, as has been shown by a committee of the House as to the Union Pacific Company, cost its original holders "not more than thirty cents on the dollar in road-making," which road-making itself paid enormous profits—profits realized through the notorious Credit Mobilier of America.

The committee gives extracts from the report of that committee. Here is a specimen:

In a report made to the House on the 20th of February, 1873, by a committee thereof, it was said of the Union Pacific Company:

"That the moneys borrowed by the corporation, under a power given them only to meet the necessities of the construction and endowment of the road, have been distributed in dividends among the corporators; that the stock was issued not to men who paid for it at par in money, but who paid for it at not more than thirty cents on the dollar in road-making; that, of the Government directors, some of them have neglected their duties and others have been evaded; that at least one of the commissioners appointed by the President has been directly bribed to betray his trust by the gift of $25,000; that the chief engineer of the road was largely interested in the contracts for its construction; and that there has been an attempt to prevent the exercise of the reserved power in Congress by inducing influential members of Congress to become interested in the profits of the transaction. So that of the safeguards above enumerated none seems to be left but the sense of public duty of the corporators."

These men have issued stock to the amount of over $36,000,000, stock obtained and issued, as that report shows, under such circumstances as these. The Central Pacific Company has issued stock to the amount of over $54,000,000, and upon it they are paying and insisting upon continuing to pay dividends quarterly at the rate of from 8 to 10 per cent. per annum, leaving the debt of the Government absolutely unprovided for, and complain bitterly because we propose to do something in a very mild way to secure ourselves against their misappropriation of funds under such circumstances.

Mr. BAYARD. I should like to ask the Senator from Kentucky how much money was subscribed and paid in for the capital stock of the companies respectively.

Mr. BECK. I am not prepared to answer accurately. The reports made by Mr. Poland and Mr. Wilson to the House of Representatives set it forth with substantial accuracy; but I have not the figures in my mind at present, nor have I the reports before me.

Mr. MERRIMON. Four hundred thousand dollars cash.

Mr. BECK. I know it was a very small sum.

Mr. BAYARD. Then, upon a bona fide subscription of $400,000 stock is now held to the amount, of how many millions does the Senator say?

Mr. BECK. Over $36,000,000.

Mr. BAYARD. And upon those $36,000,000 dividends to the amount of 8 per cent. per annum have been declared?

Mr. BECK. It was last year and for years preceding.

Mr. MERRIMON. May I read from the report made by Mr. Wilson?

Mr. BECK. I should be glad to have the exact figures.

Mr. MERRIMON. Here is one of the findings of the committee on page 21 of the report made by Mr. Wilson:

The statute requiring the capital stock to be paid for in money at par, it has in fact been paid at not exceeding thirty cents on the dollar in road-building, excepting, perhaps, the sum of about $400,000.

Mr. BAYARD. The Senator will understand me. I am not referring now to the stock of the Credit Mobilier; I am referring to the capital stock of the Central Pacific Railroad and the Union Pacific Railroad.

Mr. MERRIMON. This is the Union Pacific alone.

Mr. BAILEY. In regard to the Central Pacific, it was stated at the last session of Congress by the Senator from California [Mr. BOOTH] that suit had been actually brought by some of the stockholders of the Central Pacific against the managers to recover the profits, and they had paid to each of these $5.16 for every dollar they had subscribed to the capital stock in order to avoid the litigation.

Mr. BAYARD. Does the Senator speak of the stock of the Credit Mobilier or the capital stock of the railroad company?

Mr. BAILEY. I refer to the capital stock of the Central Pacific Railroad.

Mr. BECK. I had before me and thought I could lay my hand on it, but I cannot at this moment, a bill filed in the State of California against the Central Pacific Railroad Company, setting forth with great accuracy the frauds alleged to have been perpetrated by its construction company and the division of stock. I did not intend to refer to that specifically, because it may be that that was satisfactorily answered, but I read in the speech of my friend from North Carolina [Mr. MERRIMON] an extract of a speech made by Hon. William A. Piper, of California, in the House of Representatives, April 8, 1876, in which he made charges of the grossest frauds against them. If half of them are true these companies are entitled to but very little consideration. Not knowing whether they were absolutely sustained or not, and not desiring to reopen in this debate the questions of fraud except so far as necessary to repel intimations and charges of bad faith on our part, seeking to do no more than save the debt of the Government and embarrass the companies as little as possible, I did not desire specifically to go into any of the well-known corrupt practices connected with their original organization; nor to treat them for the purposes of this bill otherwise than as if all the stock they owned was bona fide stock, and their organization under the laws of 1862 and 1864 had been made in good faith.

I think I have established two of my propositions, that our debt will certainly be lost unless something is done and that the companies are absolutely and abundantly able, without any sort of embarrassment, to secure its payment if they desire to do so. I have shown, also, that they do not intend to do it, and they come now before the Senate with certain propositions, one of which is in the form of a bill introduced by the Senator from Arkansas, [Mr. DORSEY,] but which is in fact the proposition of the railroad companies as I find it verbatim in a pamphlet containing their argument, which some one sent to me. It there appears precisely the same as the bill introduced by the Senator from Arkansas. Therefore I say the bill that was referred to the Railroad Committee was their proposition. Looking at it as carefully as I can I am brought to the same conclusion that the Senator from Tennessee arrived at, that it was absolute confiscation of the debt to comply with the terms proposed by the companies in that bill. They offer to give us the land. But the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. BAILEY] stated it so well, I will read what he said about it; I cannot state it as well. He said:

They require the Government to pay $15,000,000 for twelve million acres of land a gift from the Government, and that this sum shall be placed at interest while they pay none, until it shall swell to the sum of $75,000,000. Next, they demand that their annual payments of $1,166,000 shall be placed at interest, and that compounded until the interest shall reach $48,000,000. But, not satisfied with these exactions, they demand that for seven years and nine months the Government shall receive no interest on $26,000,000, making a further loss of $49,000,000 or a total of $172,000,000, exceeding the entire debt, principal and interest, that will be due from them to the Government at that time.

They had the audacity—I might use a harsher term—to call that a business proposition and the best they could do in the face of such facts as I have just shown. They must have immensely overrated their own power of persuasion or influence or immensely underrated the business capacity of the men who are acting in this body as trustees for a people who in good faith loaned them the money under solemn pledges and assurances that it should be paid back to the uttermost farthing. That proposition was too ridiculous to be seriously considered, I hope, by any Senator.

The Railroad Committee did not adopt it but they offered a substitute, which was reported by the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. MATTHEWS,] which is a surrender of from forty-one to forty-five millions of our debt to these companies, and in my opinion is not worthy of the consideration of Congress on that account. But it is vicious legislation for other reasons. It is a proposition from Congress to the railroad companies which they have the right to accept or reject after retaining it for four months; it is a concession that we have no power over them under all the reservations of the acts of 1862 and 1864. It might be very well for Congress to consider a proposition made by railroad companies, but it is unworthy of Congress to be making propositions which we confess by the very act of making that we have no right to make and no power to enforce, and which it is for them to say whether they shall become laws or not. It is our business to make laws, not to propose bargains. Some Senators think the companies would accept it, some think they would not. Nobody professes to know; we are assured only of delay. I suppose they would accept it, as they could save by it forty-five millions which they justly owe us, rather than take the chances of the passage of the Judiciary Committee's bill or some other measure which does not suit them.

I shall vote to reject both these bills, that introduced by the Senator from Arkansas, and the proposition or attempt at a bargain and a surrender of our rights as well as the surrender of $45,000,000 contained in the bill introduced by the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. MATTHEWS.] I would rather stand where we are even if we did lose money, than to be bargaining with corporations upon such terms, giving them four months to accept until this Congress adjourns and allow another year to run, when the proposition will perhaps have to be modified on some point and go over again for another session or be stifled in the next short session of three months. We either have the right to have our debt secured, or we have not. If we have, we ought to secure it; if we have not, let Senators tell the country why.

I propose now, as briefly as I can, to state my construction of the rights of the Government and the corporations under the acts of 1862 and 1864, waiving the question of the power of the Government, as such, over quasi-public corporations such as these, and looking at it simply as a contract. Congress under peculiar circumstances, which I will refer to, gave the lands, loaned the credit, and advanced the money of the people to these corporations upon certain specified conditions, for the accomplishment of certain purposes, chief among which were the following: That a great railway should be constructed and perpetually maintained by these corporations, over which the Government should have the perpetual right to transport everything it desired at rates not exceeding what private persons were required to pay for like service, and when necessary should have precedence and priority over all others in the use of the roads. Government directors were to be appointed to keep Congress advised as to all matters connected with their management, so that proper steps could be taken by such legislation as might be necessary to protect the Government against any acts which might tend to thwart this great object. All the property of these corporations was by these acts (subject to a prior incumbrance authorized by the act of 1864) mortgaged to the United States to secure the repayment of the bonds issued by the Government, and the interest thereon. Five per cent. of the net earnings and one-half of the charges for Government transportation were to be applied to the payment of the interest on the Government bonds. And to guard against all contingencies, and to enable the Government at any and all times to protect the people against any act or omission of the managers of these roads, which might either render it impossible for them to secure in perpetuity the Government's right of transportation or endanger the ultimate payment of the principal and interest of the bonds, section 22 of the amendatory act of July 2, 1864, provided "that Congress may at any time alter, amend, or repeal this act." That section was as much a part of the contract—and I am willing to regard it as such, in accordance with the principles laid down in the Dartmouth College case—as any other part of the contract.

The stockholders and their boards of directors accepted all the provisions of the act, received the lands and the Government bonds issued, and obtained the money on the first-mortgage bonds under it, and agreed in consideration of all these immense benefits that the Congress of the United States should have the right at any time to alter, amend, or repeal the act. Neither party, of course, knew what contingencies might arise or in what regard the provisions, objects, and purposes of the bill might require changes to be made; but it must be apparent that Congress intended, and as trustee for the people whose money and property was being loaned and given away, demanded that the right to so legislate at any time as to protect and secure the perpetual use of the roads and the repayment of the bonds and interest by such alteration or amendment as the representatives of the people in Congress assembled might deem wise and just should be vested in them, and that the companies agreed to, and accepted that limitation and condition, without the acceptance of which they could not have received any of the benefits, rights, or privileges obtained by them under the act, especially of 1864. That was not a mere act either creating artificial persons or confined to the granting of purely corporate rights; it donated millions of acres of the public domain; it postponed the prior lien of the Government for over $54,000,000, so as to enable the companies to obtain on a first mortgage $54,000,000, which they could not have obtained but for that act, and it seems to me when Congress made such donations and concessions, it would have come far short of its duty as a public trustee if it had failed to retain power to so alter and amend the acts by which such gifts were made and such burdens imposed on the tax-payers of the country as to secure to them, by whatever legislation might become necessary, the repayment of the money and the enjoyment of the privileges which these companies undertook to pay and maintain; and it seems to me that it comes with a bad grace from these companies and their advocates to charge that as moderate, considerate, and conservative a measure as that proposed by the Committee on the Judiciary, is either a violation of contracts or in any manner harsh, oppressive, or unjust. It is conceded that the corporations will be hopelessly insolvent and that the people of the United States will be cheated out of the money they have paid for these companies, all of which they pledged themselves and their property to repay with interest, unless steps are taken now to require them to lay aside a fund for that purpose, and not divide out all their earnings among the stockholders, as they are now doing as though they owed no debts or never intended either to pay or provide for them.

The vice in the arguments of gentlemen on the other side consists in the assumption that the twenty-second section of the act of 1864 does not mean what it says. They boldly, clamorously, and, some of them, defiantly assert that, although the section expressly provides that Congress may at any time alter, amend, or repeal the act, and although the companies accepted it, agreed to it, and acted upon it, still they not only have the right to repudiate it now, but have the right to use the roads and their earnings for their own private benefit, in absolute defiance of the Government and the law. If the bill of the Judiciary Committee is as flagrant an outrage on their vested rights as they would have the Senate believe, the courts of the country are open to them, because, when the Attorney-General, under sections 10 and 11, seeks by judicial proceedings to enforce its provisions, all the rights of the corporations can be protected by judicial decisions. We are asked why we do not proceed in the courts now, without the intervention of Congress. The answer is twofold and either is satisfactory: we do not propose to embark in a five years' law-suit with them and allow them to be dividing during all that time millions on millions of dollars which, during these years of litigation, ought to be deposited for the security of the United States in the Treasury; and we do not intend at the suggestion or by the order of the companies to fail or refuse to enact such laws under the authority reserved to amend or alter the existing law as will enable us to present our claim before the courts with all the sanction that legislative authority can give. If that authority is invalid the courts will say so; if valid, the wisdom of our action as well as its legality will be vindicated. I have no doubt as to the right of Congress to pass the bill; indeed, in view of the known facts, it would, looking at them from my stand-point, be an obvious violation of our known duty if we failed to do it. I propose to waive all questions of power for the purposes of this argument and look at it as a contract, and I desire to say here that I believe the United States has no more right or constitutional warrant of authority to violate the obligation of contract than States have. I believe with Mr. Madison that—

Bills of attainder, ex post facto laws, and laws impairing the obligation of contracts are contrary to the first principles of the social compact and to every principle of sound legislation.

It never entered into his mind that the Federal Government would ever assert any such power, and I regret that the Committee on the Judiciary in their report should have intimated the possibility of the assertion of such a claim under any circumstances. I am voting for their bill, however, and not for any suggestions in their report. I would surrender all the bonds and all the interest on them before I would secure them by the exercise of authority in violation of the obligation of contracts. The grants of power to the Federal Government, though of great magnitude, were confined to general objects affecting all the people, such as war, coinage, taxation, commerce, and the like, and Congress was authorized—

To make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing powers, and all others vested by this Constitution in the Government of the United States, or in any department or officer thereof.

There was no authority given anywhere for any department of this Government to violate the obligation of contracts, and that power was neither necessary nor proper for carrying into execution any of the powers granted. The States took care that there should be no mistake as to the limitation of Federal power, by declaring in the tenth amendment that—

The powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States respectively, or to the people.

And they had all agreed that such laws should be prohibited as contrary to the first principles of the social compact and to every principle of sound legislation.

Mr. Madison, in further discussing this proposition and maintaining the wisdom of it, in the Federalist, No. 45, says:

The powers delegated by the proposed Constitution to the Federal Government are few and defined. Those which are to remain in the State governments are numerous and indefinite. The former will be exercised principally on external objects, as war, peace, negotiation, and foreign commerce; with which last the power of taxation will for the most part be connected. The powers reserved to the several States will extend to all the objects which, in the ordinary course of affairs, concern the lives, liberties, and properties of the people, and the internal order, improvement, and prosperity of the state.

Mr. President, I have said this much on this subject, although I know that the bill of the Judiciary Committee contains nothing and the proposition submitted contains nothing which violates the obligation of contracts; but I wish to exclude all possibility of a conclusion that I recognize any such right in the Federal Government in its dealings with citizens or corporations whose rights are equal—no, not exactly. The private citizen may rightfully do anything which the law does not prohibit; the corporation can only do what it is by law expressly authorized to do; but in their respective spheres their rights are equally protected.

The Government can of course by legislation affect all obligations, and can make and repeal laws which in their operations enrich or ruin citizens and corporations, and no private rights can restrain or control such legislative action. We cannot change a tariff or internal-revenue bill without having that effect. All limitation laws change the obligation of contracts in a very important sense, and all new remedies do the same thing. The obligation of thousands of contracts may be impaired or destroyed by congressional enactments. Congress is presumed to look to the public interest and the general welfare. The rights and contracts of individuals must be determined and controlled by the changes and alterations of law demanded in the opinion of the law-making power for the welfare of all. Embargoes, blockades, non-intercourse acts, to say nothing of the effect of actual war, foreign or civil, are familiar illustrations. What I contend is, that when this Government makes a contract with any person, natural or artificial, and that person performs faithfully his part of the contract, the Federal Government has no more right to violate the obligation of the contract than a State or an individual has. To illustrate: If I contract with the Government to build a custom-house at Chicago, a post-office at New York, or a court-house at Cincinnati, and perform the contract on my part faithfully, the Government is bound, by every obligation that can bind a State or a citizen, to perform its part of the contract, and it is equally bound by any contract it has entered into with the Union Pacific and Central Pacific Railroad Companies. It will never be released from its just obligations to either of them by my vote, nor will I even admit that it has the right to be so released, and I shall insist with equal earnestness that the railroad companies shall not evade nor escape from their obligations to comply with their contract to the Government. Of course, before rights are vested under any Government contract, a repeal of the law would vacate it, if the repeal took place when the contract was partially executed. Congress or the Court of Claims would adjust the amount due to the citizen. We have no questions of that sort here, and Congress, in the charters it granted, in the gifts and loans it made to these companies, recognized the fact that it was necessary, in order to prevent all misunderstanding as to the rights of the parties, to insert into the contract and make a part of it the section reserving to Congress, without consulting the companies, the right at any time to alter, amend, or repeal the acts making the loans, donating the lands, and granting the rights and privileges therein provided for.

The decision in the Dartmouth College case had induced several States to incorporate into their constitutions provisions prohibiting the granting of charters to corporations unless the right to alter, amend, or repeal them was reserved; it had become a common provision in such grants by all the State Legislatures: the courts had determined the true meaning and effect of such reservations, so that neither the States nor the companies were in doubt as to the rights, powers, and duties of each under charters containing such reservations of power. It is mere folly to contend that such reservations of power in Congress or the State Legislatures mean nothing; that States like New York and Ohio were inserting useless and meaningless provisions into their State constitutions; that the decisions of the courts, State and Federal, sustaining and enforcing legislative acts, exercising authority under their power to alter, amend, and repeal charters, are mere brutum fulmen. And it is equal folly to contend that the power to alter, amend, or repeal the act did not mean the act, but only a part of the act.

When the acts of 1862 and 1864 were passed the full force and effect of the rights reserved to and by Congress were thoroughly understood by Congress and the companies, and were of course recognized and accepted as part of the contracts, just as much, Mr. President, as if I should borrow $10,000 from you and give you a mortgage on my farm to secure it, and in the contract between us I further agreed that you should have the right, at any time you saw fit to demand it, to require an additional mortgage on my house and lot, or, failing to do so, you might rescind the contract and demand your money and interest at once. The court would enforce your right to have the additional security, or compel me on refusal to pay the money.

So in the case under consideration Congress reserved the right in the contract to alter and amend it at any time or to repeal it at pleasure, with or without reason assigned, and the companies, relying on the wisdom and the justice of Congress, accepted the terms; so that there is, as I said, no pretense that we would violate any obligation of our contract by passing the bill proposed by the Committee on the Judiciary. It is remarkable principally for the moderation of its demands and the care with which the alterations and amendments it proposes guard all vested rights and the tenderness it exhibits for the interests even of the stockholders or corporators. The corporation is made up of stockholders. The directors are their servants and agents. They are the contracting parties, the persons with whom we made the agreement, and who are bound by the terms of the acts of 1862 and 1864. Their only vested interest is the residuum of the corporate property after all the debts are paid. Yet, as I think, at the risk of loss to the United States, the largest creditor, the bill is specially careful to give at least three-fourths of the net profits, which we might demand to be held as a sinking fund, to the members of the corporation for their own use. The only vested right which the stockholders have in all the property of these corporations is, as I said, to receive and hold the balance after the debts are paid. Creditors, as such, have vested rights which Congress cannot—certainly ought not to—interfere with, which this bill protects in every form. The people of the United States have a vested right to the payment of the debt and interest which these corporations owe them, and it is our duty to see that that right is protected and secured and to see that the rights of other creditors are not put in jeopardy. They were not parties to the contract, and all the rights acquired by them before Congress exercises its right to alter, amend, or repeal the grants ought not, I insist, to be interfered with by any act of Congress.

It has been urged here that the power claimed by this bill could with equal propriety be exercised to divest the first-mortgage bondholders of their priority. It is sufficient answer to say that no such power is claimed, and I believe the courts would declare the act unconstitutional if it was attempted. All rights of third parties acquired in good faith under existing laws are sacred, and this bill proposes to hold them so; it deals solely with the parties the Government contracted with, the corporators, and requires a portion of what they are now appropriating to their own use to be held in reserve for the protection of their creditors, and this is called fraud, oppression, and monstrous injustice by the zealous advocates of these corporations even in the face of their avowals that they do not intend to pay these debts, and are preparing to make their avowals good by a division of all their assets in order to be insolvent when the debts fall due, with ample means now to secure payment of all they owe. I never heard these epithets applied before to trustees who were, without any personal interest, making an honest effort to secure an honest debt for an otherwise unprotected and defenseless people from rich and profligate debtors who were squandering their estates for the express purpose of avoiding the payment of their just debts.

I confess, in view of the well-known history of these corporations, their Credit Mobiliers and construction companies, the false statements made as to the cost of their roads and the millions of spurious stock on which vast dividends are regularly paid, which represents nothing but the fraud that issued it, the withholding of the 5 per cent. of net earnings for many years after they had obtained our lands and bonds, and the subterfuges they have continually resorted to for the purpose of swindling the tax-payers of the country, from whose sweat and toil all these millions have been wrung, and in the face of the avowals that they intend to continue to take all, and save nothing to enable them to pay their debts, that it amazes me and alarms me to hear honest and able men in this body insist, and insist vehemently, that the effort we are now making to save something for the people, and to prevent the consummation of avowed frauds and breaches of contract, even when Congress on the very face of the contract reserved the power to do so, is a wrong and an outrage on the rights of these companies. I have long thought that the day was not far distant when the question would have to be settled whether the railroad corporations controlled Congress or Congress regulated them. This will perhaps be a test case; we could not have a better one. If they have power to defeat this proposition I see but one remedy left, and that is to repeal the charters and distribute the assets. The right to repeal cannot well be denied; it has been too often exercised and sanctioned; we can get something now out of the wreck; we will get nothing but corporation domination if we submit to the defeat of this bill. The Supreme Court at the present term, in the case of Shields vs. The State of Ohio, after sustaining fully such legislation as we now propose, among other things, said:

Where an act of incorporation is repealed few questions of difficulty can arise. Equity takes charge of all the property and effects which survive the dissolution and administers them as a trust fund primarily for the benefit of creditors. If anything is left, it goes to the stockholders. Even the executory contracts of the defunct corporation are not extinguished.

Mr. President, I said I was not in favor of any harsh measure. I am not. I would do these companies no injustice, but they must be made to obey the law, secure their just debts, and submit to the legitimate authority of the Government, and I would repeal their charters and dissolve their powers and those of all like corporations before they should either cheat their creditors or dictate to Congress what its rights and duties are. I am not going to cite authorities in detail to support my views; the books are full of them; you can hardly lay your hands on a volume of reports of decisions, State or Federal, in the last fifteen years without finding a case sustaining the principles of the Judiciary Committee bill. I hold in my hand 15 Wallace Supreme Court reports; it contains three decisions from which I will read brief extracts; they have all been referred to before in this debate by the distinguished Senator from Illinois [Mr. DAVIS] and other Senators; several of them go much further than we propose to do now. In the case of Tomlinson vs. Jessup, a railroad corporation was created and its charter provided that it should be forever exempted from taxation.

The company organized. The road was built under that provision of law, or contract—call it what you will; all its rights were complete and vested under that agreement; but the provisions of the State constitution were that the Legislature might at any time alter, amend, or repeal all charters granted to railroad companies. It was by a subsequent act taxed heavily. The case came before the Supreme Court of the United States and Mr. Justice Field, delivering the opinion, among other things, said:

Immunity from taxation, constituting in these cases a part of the contract with the Government, is, by the reservation of power such as is contained in the law of 1841, subject to be revoked equally with any other provision of the charter whenever the Legislature may deem it expedient for the public interests that the revocation shall be made. The reservation affects the entire relation between the State and the corporation and places under legislative control all rights, privileges, and immunities derived by its charter directly from the State. Rights acquired by third parties, and which have become vested under the charter, in the legitimate exercise of its powers, stand upon a different footing; but of such rights it is unnecessary to speak here. The State only asserts in the present case the power under the reservation to modify its own contract with the corporations; it does not contend for a power to revoke the contracts of the corporation with other parties, or to impair any vested rights thereby acquired.

Nor does the bill of the Judiciary Committee. It deals only with the corporations. It does not even require them to do anything they did not agree to do by the contract, but simply provides that the property they are now taking and applying to their own use shall not be squandered but shall be held carefully, properly, and profitably for them without charge, so that it may accumulate for their benefit, to enable them to pay the debt which they are now seeking to avoid the payment of.

The case of Miller vs. The State, 15 Wallace, has been cited over and over again. The reserved power it was declared might be exercised, and to almost any extent, to execute the legitimate purpose of the grant or to secure the due administration of its affairs so as to protect the rights of its stockholders and of creditors, and for the proper disposition of the assets. In Holyoke Company vs. Lyman, 15 Wallace, 500, the court holds that—

The provision of the revised statutes of Massachusetts, chapter 44, section 23, and general statutes, chapter 68, section 41, declaring that acts of incorporation shall be subject to amendment, alteration, or repeal at the pleasure of the Legislature, reserves to the Legislature the authority to make any alteration or amendment of a charter granted subject to it, which will not defeat or substantially impair the object of the grant or any rights vested under it, and which the Legislature may deem necessary to secure either that object or other public or private rights.

At the present term of the Supreme Court this question was fairly presented in the case of Shields against the State of Ohio. The Lake Shore and Michigan Railroad Company refused to obey or conform to an act of the General Assembly of the State of Ohio, passed in 1873, which provided that railroad companies should not be allowed to charge over three cents per mile for passengers traveling on their roads over eight miles. Before that law was passed the directors had the right by their charter to charge whatever they deemed reasonable, and their charges exceeded three cents a mile. The constitution of Ohio adopted in 1851 gave the Legislature power to alter and amend railroad charters. The court held that the act was a valid and proper exercise of legislative power and authority. Justice Swayne, in delivering the opinion of the court, said:

It is urged that the franchise here in question was property held by a vested right, and that its sanctity as such could not be thus invaded. The answer is, Consensus facit jus. It was according to the agreement of the parties. The company took the franchise subject expressly to the power of alteration or repeal by the General Assembly. There is therefore no ground for just complaint against the State.

In the case of Pick vs. Chicago and Northwestern Railway, 6 Bissell's Reports, 181, Judge Drummond rendered a decision to the same effect, the constitution of Wisconsin giving the Legislature the right to alter, amend, or repeal charters. I might cite case after case from the supreme courts of the various States sustaining acts of their Legislatures altering, amending, and repealing all sorts of charters, under powers precisely analogous to those reserved by Congress in the acts of 1862 and 1864, in its grants to these companies, but I will not detain the Senate by doing so.

Pierce on the Law of Railways, page 36, states the principle thus:

The power to amend, alter, or repeal the charter may be reserved by the Legislature by a provision to that effect inserted therein, or in a general law declared applicable to all acts of incorporation afterward passed; and the right of the Legislature to alter or repeal the charter is thus made a part of the contract. The charter of the company is, by such a reservation, subject to any reasonable amendment or alteration which the Legislature may make, and any reasonable additional obligations may be imposed on the company. Thus, it may be required by virtue of such reservation to abandon the use of steam-power in propelling its cars through cities, or to raise or lower highways where its track crosses them, when directed by the municipal authorities. The Legislature under this power may increase the liability of the stockholders, who will not thereby be exonerated from liability on their subscriptions for stock. The subscriber has been held not to be released where the Legislature, in pursuance of such a reservation, granted to the company the power to change its route. There being a general statute of Missouri reserving the power to alter or amend acts of incorporation, an act of its Legislature making companies previously incorporated liable to laborers employed by contractors for the work done by them on their roads has been held constitutional.

The principle is, that where a contract is made (placing the right on the broadest terms of contract) and the Legislature reserves the right to alter, amend, or repeal the act, that is as much a part of the contract, as Judge Swayne said in the case of Shields vs. Ohio, as any other part of it. Consensus facit jus. "You agreed to it; you acquired rights under it; you gave us the authority to change it; you cannot say that the Legislature had no power to change it."

The ultimate right to determine the constitutionality of all acts is vested in the courts. The bill we seek to pass provides for that; the Attorney-General is required to enforce our rights by judicial authority, and the companies can be fully heard. In view of the well-settled principles I have read, they do not want to go there under the proposed law; hence this struggle.

Mr. President, the bill which seems to shock the advocates of these companies is in full accord with the object and spirit of all legislation. One of the objects for which Congress convenes and for which Legislatures assemble is by appropriate acts to so alter and amend existing laws as to enable creditors to secure the payment of their just debts from dishonest debtors. New laws are enacted to that end every day. All the legislation which authorizes the seizure of the property of absconding debtors, of men who either have conveyed or are about to dispose of their property with the purpose or effect of hindering and delaying their creditors, are of recent origin. They apply equally whether the debts are due or not due. Attachment for rent not due is a familiar case. It is not many years since chases in action could be reached by legal process. In short, remedial legislation has to keep pace with the ingenuity of dishonest men, and remedies adequate and commensurate must be furnished by amending the laws. Every right must be protected or it is of no value, and punishment must follow violations of law or the law is useless.

We are told that there is no actual default by these companies and therefore we have no right in equity to proceed against them. Grant that to be the present state of the law as claimed by the Senator from Georgia, and it only proves the imperative necessity of the passage of the law we propose in order to furnish a much-needed remedy in such a case as this. There can be none of the hardships so loudly complained of in protecting the rights of honest creditors. When the history of these corporations is considered and the bad faith they have kept with this people ever since their organization is considered, the treatment they have received at the hands of Congress has been lenient and forbearing in the extreme.

In 1868 and 1869 when the Credit Mobilier developments were brought before Congress and such a state of things as was shown in the Poland and Wilson reports was proved to be the undoubted fact, would any man have denied that Congress had the undoubted right to say "we will absolutely repeal this charter because of the shocking dishonesty of the corporations and their agents; we granted it for a great purpose; we intended it to be organized and conducted honestly and in good faith to secure these great ends; you have perverted all the objects of it and are seeking to rob the people whose money is your capital; true you have built the road, but you have issued over $36,000,000 of stock to men who are not entitled to more than a third, if to any of it; you are dividing the profits of the road among them when they have no right to them and are by giving out false obligations destroying our security; you are seeking to corrupt Congress; the very fountains of justice are being polluted by you; you are unfit depositaries of a trust of this kind and we will repeal it." Is there a court in the country that would have questioned the right to do it? I answer, not one.

I know of no higher evidence that Congress does not intend to deal harshly with these corporations than the fact that it has dealt so mercifully with them in the past; the fact that the Judiciary Committee bill is so careful to do nothing which can by possibility be tortured into a suggestion that they are being oppressed is the strongest evidence that this Congress does not intend to do anything harsh or oppressive; I confess under such circumstances I regard it as impertinent for them to come here and insist that we are violating the obligation of contracts by changing the law in order to prevent them from stealing our money; of course we are changing the law because swindling corporations have settled upon a plan to circumvent the law as it now stands, so as to rob all their creditors and defeat the objects of the Government in the grants, gifts, and loans made to them. We (I mean of course Congress) assumed at first that they would act honestly, and so trusted them, but took the precaution to guard against dishonest conduct by reserving the power to alter, amend, or repeal the contracts as events might develop the necessity for such action.

The time for prompt action has come, if Congress does not intend to surrender all the rights of the people. These men almost avow that they intend to violate their contract and destroy the vested rights of this people to the extent of $122,000,000, a sum larger than was spent for the support of this Government from 1789 to 1812; and we as trustees for the people would be co-conspirators with them if we did not so change the law as to prevent the consummation of this fraud on the rights of the tax-payers of this country whose money and property they have obtained, and whose money they avow they intend to use for their own purposes and never pay back a dollar of. Shall we stand with our arms folded and see all these great wrongs perpetrated? I trust we are not yet such abject slaves of these railroad kings.

It was said by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. MATTHEWS] the other day that by the act of 1873 we had given up all our power to amend or repeal former acts, and had thus lost our rights. When the decision in 1 Otto was read, it showed conclusively by the emphatic language used in the decision of the court that no such idea was ever thought of, but that the reverse was true, and he had to abandon that position. The distinguished Senator from Georgia [Mr. HILL] the other day, to the amazement of everybody, insisted that the act of 1871 ordering payment of the one-half transportation was a re-enactment again of the act of 1864, without the reservation contained therein, and therefore the power to alter and amend no longer existed. It was a strange straining for help to support a bad cause.

There are Senators on this floor who were here at the time that act was passed. I have the RECORD lying before me and have examined the debate then had. The proviso "that this section shall not be construed to affect the legal rights of the Government or the obligations of the companies, except as herein specifically provided" was inserted at the suggestion of the Senator from Ohio, Mr. Sherman, to prevent the possibility of such a construction being given to the act. The companies came before us pleading that they were struggling to make a start, that they were poor, that they would be greatly embarrassed if the money was withheld, and that the great objects to promote which we had given them the grants and gifts and loaned our credit would be endangered, if not lost, unless they were relieved. Attorney-General Akerman had decided against their right; not very high authority with me, I confess. Some very distinguished lawyers in the Senate and in the other House had taken the same position; but the Judiciary Committee, on resolutions submitted to them for ascertaining simply what were the rights of the companies under existing laws, through Mr. Carpenter made a report, and an able one, stating that in their opinion, under the law as it then stood, the companies had the right to have the money paid over to them; and Congress passed a law ordering it to be so paid, and that is all there was of it. The RECORD shows it; the reports of the committees show it; the debates in both Houses show it. It stands on the face of the act self-apparent. Therefore my astonishment at the position of the Senator from Georgia in answer to the Senator from Tennessee, which was as follows:

Mr. BAILEY. Will the Senator point out in what particular the act of 1871 alters, amends, or repeals the act of 1864?

Mr. HILL. It re-enacts. Gentlemen will not understand me. In the act of 1864 you enacted a right with a reservation, and you claim the right to change it by virtue of that reservation. In the act of 1871 you enacted the same right without reservation. That is the point; and I defy any lawyer to get over it. Is not the right without a reservation an amendment and improvement upon a right with a reservation? Is not an absolute right better than a qualified right?

I have tried to avoid entering into any discussion of this question beyond what was required by the facts in the case, and I have tried to speak of it as if it was a question of contract and nothing else. I have no ill-will against these corporations. As I said, I would not, no matter what they had done in the past, injure them or diminish their usefulness in the future. When they undertook the building of these roads there was a great public necessity for the work. The Supreme Court of the United States, in the opinion in the case in 1 Otto, states it very well; but it might have said much more, and might have shown that the purposes and objects of Congress gave these corporations quite as much of a public as of a private character. Military and post roads and post-offices had to be established and maintained across the continent, communication had to be kept up with the then distant States on the Pacific, and our commerce on that great ocean was at the mercy of foreign powers. Many of the privileges granted, gifts and loans made, could not perhaps be justified now, and may have been even then a strain upon constitutional power, but the position was as anomalous as the powers and grants were extraordinary; and the condition of things must be considered when the action is criticised. War was flagrant, a great civil war, which looked to the dismemberment of the Republic. The leading commercial nations of the world, envious of our growing greatness, were looking on, and without genuine sympathy for either side were glad to see the work of destruction progressing.

Great Britain, with the selfishness and far-seeing sagacity which has always characterized her and which has made her what she is, was appropriating to herself the ocean commerce of the world. We had up to 1861 been her most formidable rival. Before 1864 she had succeeded in obtaining almost complete control of the North and South Atlantic, the Mediterranean, and the Indian Oceans. She was consolidating and securing her power in India, excluding all competitors by obtaining or coercing exclusive rights to build railroads through Turkey and Persia by the valley of the Euphrates; she stood prepared and has succeeded in securing control of the Isthmus of Suez Canal; she had then and now, I believe, every coaling station on both sides of the coast of South America by treaty with those powers, so that neither we nor any other nation could without her consent sail a steamship from our Atlantic or Gulf ports to our possessions on the Pacific Ocean, far less maintain either a fleet or a commercial marine there. The apprehension of English statesmen that we would reach and control the commerce of China, Japan, and Eastern Asia, and the great islands of the Pacific from our western coast was the main cause of her desire to see our commercial greatness and unity destroyed.

She had no genuine sympathy outside of interest with either side in our great struggle. I need not tell of the millions she spent during those years in building railroads in India, nor of her gigantic efforts there, in Abyssinia, and elsewhere to produce cotton and thus become independent of us in obtaining the great staple upon which her manufacturers depended; nor need I show how like a great spider she had extended her web to catch all the prey that was afloat in the world. She had Halifax on one side of us and Bermuda on the other; with Gibraltar and Malta she owned the Mediterranean; with St. Helena, the Cape of Good Hope, and the Mauritius she controlled the South Atlantic and the Indian oceans, and the mouth of the Bosphorus and the Baltic were sealed up by her and her retainers. If we remained united and our Pacific coast was open to our use her lucrative trade with Eastern Asia was in danger in its only vulnerable point, and it was about all we could surely look to in the near future for which to compete on a large scale.

Other nations were adding to our embarrassments. France, in defiance of our much vaunted Monroe doctrine, had sent great armies to Mexico and sought to establish an empire there; in short, it was painfully apparent that unless we succeeded in building and maintaining a transcontinental railway through our own territory beyond the reach of British ships not only was all trade and commerce on the Pacific Ocean an impossibility without her consent, but all the great States and Territories west of the Rocky Mountains were not only left without the protection they were entitled to demand, but they could at any time, if so disposed, defy Federal power and authority. Therefore, looking at the whole question as it appeared in 1862 and 1864, these enterprises partook largely of a public character, and as such were expected to be under the control of the Government for all its purposes, and subject to its orders. That may have induced the granting of such vast powers under these extraordinary circumstances. But I do not care to inquire into any of the acts then done, nor do I inquire what rights the Government may have under and by virtue of its paramount and sovereign authority over such military and postal highways; it is enough for my purposes to show that the right to alter, amend, and repeal the acts at pleasure was expressly reserved to Congress in the face of the grants—not the right merely to repeal, alter, or amend the chartered rights, strictly speaking, but the language is the right "to alter, amend, or repeal this act," the whole act, and every provision of it—to take back anything that was mismanaged, misapplied, or misappropriated. The companies agreed that that might be done, took these rights, and accepted them with that distinct understanding and agreement nominated in the bond.

It seems to me there can be no doubt about that. It has been argued that we acquired great benefits from these roads. We did. It was a regal undertaking, and we paid for it with princely liberality. Independent of the postponement of our vast debt to a private debt of $54,000,000 we gave them, as the Judiciary Committee show in their report, coal lands alone, as their directors say, larger than all the anthracite-coal fields of Pennsylvania—coal that they can now obtain in inexhaustible quantities and put upon the road at $1.29 a ton, and they are doing it, as our directors' report shows. We gave them twenty-one million one hundred thousand acres of land, or over thirty-three thousand square miles—more territory than is contained in the six States of Massachusetts, New Hampshire, Rhode Island, Connecticut, New Jersey, and Delaware, all of the vast domain being within ten miles of a great transcontinental line of railroad—more, I repeat, than six States represented by twelve Senators on this floor; and if these railroads are allowed now to defy our power they will perhaps in a few years have more than twelve Senators themselves. It is suggested to me by my friend the Senator from Ohio [Mr. THURMAN] that we gave them the right to all the material they wanted off the public lands and the right of way besides. Therefore I say we have paid, independent of the debt we seek to secure, for everything these corporations have done, and paid for it most lavishly. Perhaps our gifts in lands and other things are worth $100,000,000. As the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. MERRIMON] now suggests to me, the territory is an empire of itself; and surely they ought to be required, when they solemnly covenanted to pay their debt to us, to so use their means as to make it reasonably certain that they will do so.

Complaint is made that we require them to pay the money for the sinking fund into the Treasury of the United States, the Treasury of the creditor. It is their Treasury as well as our Treasury. This Government is a representative Government, and these corporations and their individual corporators are as much part of it as any member of the Senate or House. Long before these bonds mature every member of the Senate will perhaps have passed away, from this place at least. Other men will be here, but they will only be the representatives and trustees of the people, the representatives of the tax-payers, as we are; and the Treasury of the United States is the Treasury of all of us. Can there be any other place as safe? Will the corporations themselves ask to be allowed to hold it? Nobody would suggest that. Can a better place be suggested? Will not the fund be held sacredly? If it is invested in the bonds of the United States and the interest is compounded as rapidly as it is collected, so as to realize a sum equal to the interest we are now paying, how can they object if they intend to be honest? All they are entitled to is the corporate property and its profits after the debts are paid; they knew that when they took the stock. This will be a fund accumulated for the purpose of paying those very debts so as to increase the value of their property. But it seems as though these directors do not desire that the property should increase in value, do not intend that it should be kept up in perpetuity, but that they shall, when these debts fall due, have the power to force its sale and buy it in for perhaps the first-mortgage debt or less, knowing that we will never consent to run the roads ourselves, that nobody will ever pay our debt, and that there will be no fear of the men who now own the first-mortgage bonds combining against them, as they will take care to be the holders of them.

Mr. President, I have said all I desire and more than I intended to say on that subject. I know and fear the power of these great railroad corporations, and my apprehensions were increased by the speech made the other day by the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. MERIMON] whose cool judgment and judicial training seldom allows him to use severe language. Among other things he said:

Mr. President, I do not hesitate to declare my conviction that one of the great, rising public dangers in this country now is the undue, ever-increasing power and influence of corporations over the material, moral, and social interests of the people.

This subject ought to attract a large share of public attention and engage the serious consideration of every legislative body. I do not underrate the advantages and benefits, public and private, of railroad corporations. I recognize them. I am not hostile to them. I would not, I will not hesitate to protect them in all their just rights, but I see and know and appreciate the high importance of keeping them well guarded by proper legislation and in subordination to government. They have great capacities for evil as well as good. They are close to the people and affect them materially in almost all the relations of life. Much the greater part of the evils to which I have made reference have been the fruits of the vicious practices of railroad corporations and their agents. Every intelligent observer knows that they have in large measure dominated the industries, the trade, the travel, the commerce, the legislation, the public men, and the press of this country. Not infrequently they have debauched members of Congress and members of State Legislatures; they have repeatedly subsidized numbers of powerful newspapers; they have set up and pulled down public men; they have walked boldly and insolently into the Halls of Congress and undertaken to dictate measures of legislation. Nay, sir, if one may trust what he reads almost daily in the newspapers and hears on every hand, their agents and lobbyists throng the corridors and lobbies, and have for months, of this Capitol, in reference to the very measures now under consideration.

Sir, are these things true? Are they substantially true? Alas, they are too true! The mind sickens with disgust at the thought of them! The recital of them must fill every honest man with indignation.

That is a terrible arraignment. My apprehension is, it is only too true.

In my judgment, those corporations believe that they are almost omnipotent, and they are gathering around these corridors and in our galleries and lobbies everywhere, believing that they can convince all men that they have power to make and unmake Senators and Representatives; a large and influential portion of the press belongs to them, and they are now insolently demanding that they shall not be required to secure any of the people's debt, but shall be allowed to go on and use the roads, with all the profits of them, for their own benefit.

The Senator from Ohio [Mr. THURMAN] said truly the other day that the time perhaps had come when it was to be determined who were the strongest, the people or the corporations; and he expressed great faith in the power of an awakened people. I say to him and to the Senate that the fact is being rapidly developed that the people of this country intend to rise above all corporations and assert their rights against and their power over them; and the public man who thinks that any corporation, however rich or powerful, is going to control this body, and put down this people and sustains them in their efforts to do so, will be snuffed out like a candle, and he ought to be. We are the trustees of the people, and it is our solemn and sworn duty to protect their rights against all the combinations of wealth and power, and when a constitutional, honest, fair measure is devised and presented, whereby we can protect them and do no injustice to anybody, it behooves us, if we intend to be true to ourselves and true to the great trusts we represent, to see to it that they are protected. Believing that the Committee on the Judiciary have accomplished that purpose in an entirely proper and judicious way, I shall take great pleasure in supporting their bill.

Mr. COKE. Mr. President, I ask that Senate bill No. 104 amending section 1661, title 16, (The Militia,) of the Revised Statutes of the United States be now taken up for consideration. That bill was made the special order for to-day.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. (Mr. ROLLINS in the chair.) The Senator from Texas asks that the bill at present under consideration be informally laid aside and that Senate bill 104 be now taken up for consideration.

Mr. COKE. I ask that the amendment be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to laying aside informally the pending bill and taking up Senate bill No. 104?

Mr. CHRISTIANCY. I hope that will not be done. I have a few words to say on this bill, and may as well take this opportunity as put it off and prolong the discussion until to-morrow.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Michigan claims the floor on the pending bill.

Mr. COKE. Of course I give way.

Mr. CHRISTIANCY. Mr. President, I wish to reply very briefly to the argument of my friend the Senator from Georgia [Mr. HILL] upon the question of power involved in the bill from the Judiciary Committee, so far as I think it important that a reply should be made. I shall be very brief. If the premises upon which he reared his argument be correct, I grant that his argument was an able one; and whether, upon that hypothesis, I would agree with him in his conclusions, I shall not now stop to inquire. My effort will be to show that he is mistaken in his premises, and that these have no foundation in fact or law. And if I show this, I may spare myself the trouble of proving what all will at once admit, that all logical conclusions drawn from such false premises must themselves be as false.

The Senator, after some preliminary remarks, lays down four propositions as the basis of his argument, which I will read:

First, by the act of 1862, Congress created a corporate being, a body-politic, and named it the Union Pacific Railroad Company.

Second, this corporate being, thus created, Congress endowed with all the powers, privileges, and franchises usually granted to corporations, and especially authorized and empowered it "to lay out, locate, construct, furnish, maintain, and enjoy a continuous railroad and telegraph, with the appurtenances," between designated points.

Third, to this being, thus created and endowed, the Congress also granted certain privileges, such as the right of way through the public lands without compensation and through other lands with compensation, and also certain property, and especially alternate sections of the public lands amounting to several millions of acres. All these rights, powers, privileges, and grants were granted, without money and without price, by the sovereign grace and favor to the child thus born of the sovereign's loins.

Fourth—and I ask the Senate to mark the difference—after thus creating this corporate being and after thus clothing it with powers and with authority to contract and be contracted with, the Congress itself proposed to authorize at once a contract with it in behalf of the United States. The Congress deemed that the construction of a railroad to the Pacific Ocean would be a great benefit to the Government in the way of saving in transportation, would greatly increase the wealth and power of the people, and perhaps maintain the integrity of the Union. To enable the Union Pacific Railroad Company to construct, equip, and maintain its portion of this railroad and telegraph line to the Pacific Ocean, Congress proposed to make it a loan in bonds, &c.

Now, I wish to call attention to this point: looking at the Senator's language alone, the idea conveyed in these several propositions is that Congress first created, had actually completed the creation of the railroad company, before these various powers, franchises, privileges, and properties were conferred upon it. I should not have thought that such could be the meaning of the Senator, had he not, in answer to a question of the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. EDMUNDS,] used this language:

If there had been nothing done but to pass the acts, there would have been corporations created; those corporations would have been vested with corporate powers and privileges, because that is done by the direct act of Congress; but, if the acts had been passed and if nothing else had been done, would there have been any contract?

Here the idea is distinctly carried out that the simple passage of the act created the corporation.

Mr. HILL. Of course the Senator will understand that that included the acceptance of the company, of course.

Mr. CHRISTIANCY. I should infer not from the language used.

Mr. HILL. In the subsequent colloquy with the Senator from Vermont, I distinctly said so. Of course I admit you cannot force a franchise on anybody. The organization of the corporation is one thing.

Mr. CHRISTIANCY. The Senator himself clearly distinguishes between the acceptance and the charter merely; and the language, as he used it, clearly shows his idea that the corporation was created by the act without an acceptance.

Mr. HILL. Oh, no.

Mr. CHRISTIANCY. I will read it again in order to see what it is:

If there had been nothing done but to pass the acts, there would have been corporations created; those corporations would have been vested with corporate powers and privileges, because that is done by the direct act of Congress; but, if the acts had been passed and if nothing else had been done, would there have been any contract?

Certainly not without acceptance. And the Senator continues to follow out that idea. I may have misapprehended the real meaning of the Senator; but one thing is clear, he does endeavor to establish the idea that this corporation was complete before there was any contract for loan. So much is clear, and all the rest of the reasoning is in accordance with that proposition. But, as the Senator now disclaims any idea that a corporation can be created without acceptance, I will omit what I had proposed to say upon that point.

Mr. HILL. I think in the colloquy with the Senator from Ohio [Mr. THURMAN] he made the remark, "You cannot force franchises on anybody," and I said "of course." All I mean is that the corporation is created by the prerogative power, of course by the acceptance of the grantees, without any intervention of executive agency.

Mr. CHRISTIANCY. Precisely; and that is exactly what I said; and so we agree upon that.

Mr. HILL. But the passage of the act, and its acceptance by the corporation, does not make the contract, so far as the loan is concerned; it makes the contract of franchise, but does not perfect the contract of loan; and without subsequent acts, and without actual contract, and without intervention by the executive department of the Government, the contract of loan would amount to nothing. It would be a mere proposition. That is what I meant to say.

Mr. CHRISTIANCY. I will omit, then, what I had proposed to say in reference to that point, because I see that the Senator disclaims the meaning that I thought clearly derivable from the language.

But all the provisions, as well those in reference to the creation of the corporations and those giving the rights, powers, and franchises, as those agreeing to make the loan mentioned in the Senator's fourth proposition, are all contained in one and the same act, and all took effect together as an entire act, at one and the same time upon the acceptance by the corporations.

Mr. HILL. Now, I want to call the attention of the Senator to a clause in my remarks, so that this matter may be put perfectly right.

Mr. CHRISTIANCY. I will take the Senator's word for that. I make no question about it.

Mr. HILL. But if the Senator will allow me I wish simply to read a clause. The Senator from Ohio [Mr. THURMAN] said to me:

They did not take effect until the company accepted them, for you cannot force a grant on anybody.

That is in relation to the franchises.

Therefore, it required two to make those franchises come into being, just as much as it required two to make this loan come into existence.

Mr. HILL—

In reply—

Mr. HILL. And the point is that it requires more than two to give effect to this legislation for the loan. My point is that the corporation is created and the franchises conferred by the act of Congress, of course by consent of the other party, and that no executive agency intervened for any purpose; that it becomes complete in the parties by the passage of the act.

Mr. CHRISTIANCY. I see now what the Senator means. The Senator's fourth proposition conveys the idea that after the creation of the corporation had become complete and perfect Congress authorized it to contract and be contracted with, and now notice the change of idea to meet the argument he was about to make. "Congress," he says, "proposed to authorize a contract with it in behalf of the United States." "Congress proposed to make it a loan in bonds," &c. He then proceeds to put himself upon the ground, not that the provisions of the fifth section, in reference to the loan, created an actual contract to make the loan even by the acceptance of the company, but that it only authorized a loan to be made by the executive department of the Government; and that it was the issuing of the bonds to the company which created the contract of loan, and not the provisions of the fifth section when that became operative by acceptance. That I believe I state correctly. If not, I will yield to be set right.

Mr. HILL. I have not observed any error of statement.

Mr. CHRISTIANCY. The Senator thus makes this entire matter of the loan a kind of detached lever, a separate, independent, and subsequent contract, not contained in the act of Congress, which he calls only a power of attorney to make the contract. He thus seeks to take this matter of loan entirely out of the act. It is not, according to this, one of the terms or stipulations of an entire contract created by the act and its acceptance, and of course, if this view be correct, it did not constitute a dependent part or consideration of that entire contract, nor any part of it, and the rest of the act would be just as valid a contract with the provision left out, which he calls a mere authority to make a contract. It would not be very important to either party to the contract created by the act, it is true. For if a mere authority to the executive department to make a contract, then that department might refuse to make it. But let us see if the merely issuing of the bonds, and handing these over to the company, constituted the contract of loan. It is essential to the contract of loan that there should be a stipulation to repay in some manner. Where would this be, if the mere issuing of the bonds constituted the contract? There was no such stipulation in the bonds issued by the Government, of course. Was there, upon the issue of the bonds, an agreement taken back from the company to pay, and providing how and when payment should be made? Certainly not. Every one must at once see that both the agreement of the Government and obligation to make the loan, and that of the company to repay it, and all the terms of the whole matter, were fixed and settled by the act and its acceptance; that these agreements and terms are to be found nowhere else, and that they constitute the entire contract in reference to the loan. This might be illustrated in a great many ways, but it is unnecessary. Is it not perfectly manifest, that what the Senator terms the contract made by the executive department under the act of Congress as a mere power of attorney, consists of nothing more or less than executive acts in the execution and performance of the real contract created by the act and its acceptance—acts which the executive department was not merely authorized, but commanded, to perform in the execution and performance of that contract? To render all this clear I here read the fifth section of the act of 1862; of course I need not here speak of the act of 1864, which in no manner alters the argument:

That for the purposes herein mentioned the Secretary of the Treasury shall, upon the certificate in writing of said commissioners of the completion and equipment of forty consecutive miles of said railroad and telegraph in accordance with the provisions of this act, issue to said company bonds of the United States of $1,000 each, payable in thirty years after date, bearing 6 per cent. per annum interest, (said interest payable semi-annually,) which interest may be paid in United States Treasury notes or any other money or currency which the United States have or shall declare lawful money and a legal tender to the amount of sixteen of said bonds per mile for each section of forty miles; and to secure the repayment to the United States, as hereinafter provided, of the amount of said bonds so issued and delivered to said company, together with all the interest thereon which shall have been paid by the United States, the issue of said bonds and delivery to the company shall ipso facto constitute a first mortgage on the whole line of the railroad and telegraph, together with the rolling stock, fixtures, and property of every kind and description, and in consideration of which said bonds may be issued; and on the refusal or failure of the said company to redeem said bonds, or any part of them, when required so to do by the Secretary of the Treasury, in accordance with the provisions of this act, the said road, with all the rights, functions, immunities, and appurtenances thereunto belonging, and also all lands granted to the said company by the United States, which, at the time of said default, shall remain in the ownership of the said company, may be taken possession of by the Secretary of the Treasury for the use and benefit of the United States: Provided, This section shall not apply to that part of any road now constructed.

The Senator seemed to find something which he thought strengthened his argument in the provision, that the issuing and delivering of the bonds should, "ipso facto," constitute a first mortgage. But this is only providing for the execution of the contract and what effect its execution in this particular should have by way of security. And what, let me ask, but this section and the acceptance of the act by the company, gave the effect of a mortgage to the issue and delivery of the bonds? Not, certainly, any contract made by the Secretary of the Treasury when he delivered the bonds in execution of the agreement.

If the Senator had taken the ground, that the issue and delivery of the bonds carried the contract into effect, pro tanto, and claimed that the right to the loan, on the terms mentioned in the act, had become a vested right, I could at least have comprehended the drift of his argument, whether I should agree with him or not.

Mr. HILL. The Senator will allow me just a moment to show that he is arguing a point about which there is no controversy between us.

Mr. CHRISTIANCY. I hope the Senator will allow me to proceed.

Mr. HILL. I never pretended that the acts of the executive department alone created a contract or constituted a contract, but I went on to show that there could be no contract without these acts superadded. I ask the Senator to just allow me to read from my remarks.

It was the act of the party under the judgment and adjudication of the executive department and the issue and the delivery of the bonds in compliance with the authority of Congress to make the contract that created the obligations and the rights.

That is what you call vested rights. That is precisely what I mean.

That is the point. Congress gives the authority to make the contracts. I grant that without the authority—

I call the attention of the Senator to this—

I grant that without the authority the contracts cannot be made, but equally the authority without the other acts makes no contract. Legislation only authorized the contracts to be made, &c.

Mr. CHRISTIANCY. Undoubtedly; but he calls the act a proposition only, though accepted.

Mr. HILL. I say it takes all these acts to complete the contract. It takes the authority from Congress, it takes the act of the party, not only to accept but to comply with the terms, and it takes the act of the executive department, all to make the contract.

Mr. CHRISTIANCY. If the Senator pleases, it took the acts of the executive department to execute the contract which Congress had made by the act and the company had made by its acceptance. That is all the answer I wish to make to the Senator.

Mr. HILL. The executive department executes the authority which the act gives; it does not execute the contract.

Mr. CHRISTIANCY. Yes; and that was executing the contract. The contract gave the companies the right on certain conditions, when they had done certain things, to demand those bonds, and the bonds were given in performance of the contract. That is all there is of that point.

Mr. HILL. It was the performance of the authority that the act bestowed upon the executive department.

Mr. CHRISTIANCY. It was not, however, the contract, as the Senator's speech clearly indicated. But on this question of vested rights, the field of inquiry, just what has and what has not become a vested right, is a very broad one, and the landmarks are not so accurately defined as to put an end to all questions which may arise. The instances I gave, in my argument a few days ago, were merely examples about which there could be no dispute. I did not then and do not now insist that there may not be rights vested, growing out of the contract, besides the right to tangible property, and especially as between the Government, on the one side, and third persons on the other, who have dealt with the company before any amendment made in the acts.

It is not even necessary in this case to claim that, after these companies had received these bonds in part execution of the contract, and while they remained in the hands of the companies, Congress could, by an amendment, require the bonds to be given back, much less that the present owners of the bonds who have purchased them before amendments could be denied, by amendment, the benefit of their first mortgage or their rights be made subject to those of the Government.

If the Senator wishes to push my argument to that extent, I am not responsible for the argument by which he attempts it. I did not and do not push it to that extent here, nor shall I enter into any controversy upon such an attempted extension of the principles I have endeavored to lay down. It is sufficient for me to show that we have power to do what is proposed to be done by the bill of the Judiciary Committee; which is, not to take back the bonds which have been issued, nor to require the company to pay them one day earlier than required by the contract: but, under the power, at any time, to alter, amend, or repeal these acts, subject to which and conditional upon which every provision and every right stipulated in the contract was given and accepted, the power only to compel these children of the "sovereign's loans," holding their existence or rights upon this condition, and for great public as well as private purposes, to conduct their affairs as well with reference to the public as to their private interests, as well with reference to the interests of creditors as to their own interests. In short, according to the dictates of honesty and prudence, upon such honest business principles as other great corporate enterprises of this kind are conducted by honest and prudent men, by beginning in time to make provision for the payment of their debts when they shall become due, instead of putting the entire income of this great enterprise into their own pockets, leaving nothing to pay their debts when due; and this too, when, by their confession, if the business shall continue to be carried on in this way until the Government and first-mortgage bonds become due, the property will be worth less than their debts.

But, coming back now to the matter of this loan, I think I have sufficiently shown that the whole contract in reference to it (if it be a contract at all, which for the sake of the argument I admit the whole of the act to be) was and is contained in the act of 1862 as amended by that of 1864. The Senator has treated the matter of the loan as a separate and independent contract, in some way, I suppose, growing out of the statute contract. Mr. President, there are, I believe, certain animals of an inferior order, or animalcula, consisting of several sections, and having the power, by a kind of self-scission, of propagating or cutting themselves up into as many separate and independent animals as there are sections.

And the Senator seems to me to have mistaken the entire contract created by the act and its acceptance, and composed of many provisions, for a creation somewhat of that kind, with the power of propagating independent contracts in the same manner. I propose to show him that it is a being of an entirely different kind, an organism more complex and more highly differentiated, to use the language of Herbert Spencer, both as to organs and functions; and, however numerous the sections, they are all but organs or parts of one whole, and incapable of separate and independent existence; that the matter of the loan is one of a great number of stipulations in a single contract—in the entire contract created by the acts and their acceptance, and taking effect at the same time and with, and only as a part of, the entire contract in reference to this great enterprise; that it never did and never can stand alone as an independent contract. And to prove this it is only necessary to state what will be at once apparent to every one who looks at these acts, which are to be treated as the contract, (if there be any,) and it will at once be seen that, after the provisions providing for incorporation and its general nature and purposes, the whole act is made up of a great number of provisions, part of them evidently intended to secure the interest of the United States, and the others for the benefit of the company; the one set of stipulations being the inducement or consideration for the other.

So that, as in most other contracts, every stipulation has a bearing upon every other; and we are compelled to presume that the assent of both parties to the contract could not have been given if any one of the provisions had been left out. And among these is the important provision without which the assent of the United States would not have been given and the act could not have been passed, and that is that "Congress may at any time alter, amend, or repeal this act;" not merely that portion of the act which created the corporation and gave it its corporate franchise, which the Senator from Georgia admits Congress can do under this reservation of power; not merely that Congress may, in case of a violation or failure of the company to perform the duties imposed upon it by the acts—as many corporation charters do expressly provide, and as this evidently would, if such had been the intention, unless we are to presume that Congress was incapable of finding language to express so simple a qualification.

No, Mr. President, this reserves no qualified powers, but the whole legislative power, without restriction. In other words, they reserved all their power in reference to this act which they had before it passed. They parted with none of it. Before its passage they might have inserted or refused to insert any provision they pleased, or refused to pass any act at all. And just that power they reserved, and the companies agreed to that reservation. There is therefore no limit to the power of amendment and repeal, except that such amendment or repeal cannot divest property or rights vested, as I have already endeavored to explain. And whatever doubts may be entertained as to what constitutes such vested rights or property, or whatever difficulty may be found in defining them, one thing at least is certain: and that is, that the company can have no such vested right in any provision of the contract, as such, contained in the act, the full power to amend or repeal which is thus reserved; nor can any right be thus vested which stands solely upon such provision, without some additional ground of right; for this would be to deny the right to amend any provision of the act, and to reduce the reservation of power to an absolute nullity; while the Senator himself admits that, under this power, Congress may amend or repeal the provisions giving corporate existence, or granting corporate franchises, as well as those "regulating the exercise of their powers, privileges, and franchises." And yet those things constitute the contract just as much as the provision in reference to the loan. That was decided as long ago as the Dartmouth College case.

Mr. HILL. I should like to ask the Senator a question there. Does the Senator hold that that contract of loan, to call it a contract of loan, is any part of the franchise?

Mr. CHRISTIANCY. I do not care what the Senator calls it.

That which we call a rose,
By any other name would smell as sweet.

It is a part of a contract contained in the charter, a part of a contract contained in those acts; and what the Senator calls a contract is simply the acts of performance of the contract.

Mr. HILL. I would ask the Senator the question if a contract to loan money is at any time, anywhere, between any parties on earth, a franchise?

Mr. CHRISTIANCY. Not between individuals, of course.

Mr. HILL. Is a contract of loan between the Government and individuals a franchise?

Mr. CHRISTIANCY. I do not care what you call it, whether you call it a franchise or anything else, it is a part of the act and a provision, subject to the power of repeal just as every other provision in the act is.

No, Mr. President, there is no other limitation upon the power to affect corporations by amendment in such a case than that which limits all other legislative power, that you shall not divest property or rights vested, as the power to do this is vested only in the judiciary. But the Senator, like most others who have denied this power of Congress, assumes that, if the power exists, it will and must be abused and so unjustly exercised as to destroy these companies. I have endeavored to expose this fallacy before, and I only wish now to render it a little more clear and to quiet the alarm he appears to feel at the existence of such a power. Let me say to the Senator that he and I have the physical power to do a great many wicked things. We have the physical power to kick or even to kill any child we may happen to meet along the streets of this city. But, as experience has shown that we are not particularly dangerous in that way, we have thus far been allowed to run at large in the full enjoyment of that physical power, and the presumption is that we will not abuse it. The parallel is complete; and, to carry the comparison a little further, while others might justly complain of any interference with their children, I think all would readily admit the entire propriety of so far interfering with our own children as to make them conform their actions to the principles of honesty and fair dealing and to prevent their becoming dangerous either to their parents or to others. And so I think the nation may do with (to use the Senator's figure) these "children" of its own "loans."

Mr. HILL. Then you think the nation can do anything in the world provided it does it wisely and prudently?

Mr. CHRISTIANCY. I think just what I have said. I am not responsible, as I said before, for any extension which the Senator or anybody else may seek to give to what I have said.

Mr. HILL. I thought Congress, to have any power, must have a legislative grant of power. If the Senator will allow me I should like to ask him a question. I thought Congress to have that power at all must have a legislative grant in the Constitution. Now, I ask the Senator this—

Mr. CHRISTIANCY. Then let me put a question there. Does the Senator hold that Congress had no power to pass that act at all?

Mr. HILL. No, I think Congress had the power to create the corporation; I am inclined to think so, though I do not say that I would extend that power in Congress very far. I think perhaps it has power to create a corporation as incidental or necessary to carry out certain other powers; for instance, the power to make war and the power to create post-routes. I will not discuss that point now; but I ask the Senator, does he hold that Congress anywhere possesses the power to impair the obligation of any contract?

Mr. CHRISTIANCY. Where that power is explicitly reserved to alter it in the act creating it, I do hold that Congress may alter it.

Mr. HILL. Then does the Senator hold that Congress can acquire a power by reservation which it does not have without the reservation? If Congress does not find the original power—

Mr. CHRISTIANCY. Wait one moment. I answered that question in what I supposed to be the Senator's sense. He asked whether Congress had a right to impair a contract.

Mr. HILL. As an original power.

Mr. CHRISTIANCY. In his sense I answered that question, that it could do so where the power was reserved, and on my ground, which I have explained over and over again, that where the power is reserved it constitutes a part of the contract, and there the contract is made subject to it, and to amend the contract is not, then, to impair it.

Mr. HILL. Then I ask the Senator to explain to me how it is that Congress can acquire a legislative power by a reservation in its own act.

Mr. CHRISTIANCY. It does not, and I have just stated that Congress held the entire power before, and by that act it never parted with any of it.

Mr. HILL. The power, though, to change the contract now is a legislative power. I want to know where Congress gets a power by a reservation to do what it had not the power to do originally. The power which the Senator claims for Congress here is legislative power.

Mr. CHRISTIANCY. Before Congress had originally passed any act no such question could arise. I think that is evident, and when they did pass it, they passed it subject to this condition, that any provision might be amended.

Mr. COKE. Mr. President—

Mr. MORRILL. I desire to submit a few remarks upon this bill, but I do not wish to go on to-night. If the bill of the Senator from Texas be taken up informally, I will yield for that purpose.

Mr. COKE. I ask that the pending bill be informally laid aside that the Senate may now take up for consideration Senate bill No. 104.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the proposition of the Senator from Texas? The Chair hears no objection to the present consideration of the bill indicated.

Mr. ALLISON. The bill is not to be put on its final passage to-day, I understand, but the Senator from Texas, I believe, wishes to submit some remarks. I have no objection, with that understanding.

Mr. COKE. The bill was made the special order for to-day, and I desire its consideration now, and that it be put upon its passage.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator desires action on the bill.

Mr. COKE. I desire action on the bill to-day.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair hears no objection, and the bill is before the Senate.

THE MILITIA.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. No. 104) amending section 1661, title 16, (The Militia,) of the Revised Statutes of the United States.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Military Affairs with amendments.

Mr. COKE. I ask that the amendment submitted by me be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be reported.

The amendment heretofore submitted by Mr. COKE was read, being to insert as an additional section the following:

SEC. 2. The several States shall have the right, through their respective governors, to select the kind or character of arms and equipments to be issued to them respectively under this act: Provided, That the arms and equipments so selected shall not exceed in cost the pro rata of the State making the selection: And provided, further, That the arms selected may, in the opinion of the Secretary of War, be furnished without detriment to the public interest.

Mr. KERNAN. I wish to offer an amendment to the first section of the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will inform the Senator from New York that the amendments of the committee are first in order.

Mr. KERNAN. This is an amendment to the first section. I suppose the committee report a substitute for the original bill. In the ninth line of the first section, after the word "equipments," I move to insert, "and quartermaster stores, including camp and garrison equipage;" so as to read:

The annual sum of $1,000,000 is appropriated, to be paid out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the purpose of providing arms and equipments and quartermaster stores, including camp and garrison equipage, for the whole body of the militia, either by purchase or manufacture, by and on account of the United States.

If the Senator from Texas will permit me I will state in a word why—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will inform the Senator from New York that the amendment which he proposes will not be in order until after the amendments reported by the committee shall have been acted upon.

Mr. KERNAN. This is an amendment to the amendment of the committee.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands it to be an amendment to the original bill.

Mr. KERNAN. Then I am wrong in supposing the amendments of the committee to be a substitute for the original bill. I ask the Secretary to reserve the amendment until it shall be in order.

Mr. COKE. Mr. President, I propose to submit a few remarks in explanation of this bill and the amendment offered. Section 1661 of the Revised Statutes, being the act of April 23, 1808, passed in pursuance of the constitutional power of Congress "to provide for organizing, arming, and disciplining the militia," makes an annual appropriation of $200,000 "for the purpose of providing arms and equipments for the whole body of the militia, either by purchase or manufacture by or on account of the United States." The first section of the bill before the Senate is in the precise language of section 1661 of the Revised Statutes referred to, except that the words "two hundred thousand" are stricken out and "one million" inserted in their place. In other words, the annual appropriation of $200,000 made by the act of 1808 for arming and equipping the militia is by the first section of this bill raised to $1,000,000. The bill as originally introduced by myself made no other change in the existing law, but the Committee on Military Affairs, to which it was referred, added five clauses or sections, which in substance provide that the arms furnished to the States respectively shall remain the property of the United States, and requires an annual report accounting for them; also, for the condemnation and sale of such as shall become unserviceable or unsuitable, and for the liability of persons intrusted with them for loss or damage beyond ordinary wear and the accidents of service, &c.

I preferred the bill as introduced, Mr. President, without these added clauses. They had not been deemed necessary by the framers of the law of 1808, and I cannot see why it is necessary to hamper the discretion of the authorities of the States, who are presumed to be desirous of conserving the public interests and to have the necessary intelligence to do so in dealing with the arms proposed to be furnished them. But the Committee on Military Affairs having ingrafted these amendments upon the bill, I support it as amended because satisfied it would be useless to attempt a defeat of the amendments.

The amendment which I now propose, and which has been read, makes no change in the bill as reported, except to permit the States to designate the kind and character of arms to be issued to them respectively, save when in the opinion of the Secretary of War it will be detrimental to the public interest to do so. The necessity for this provision arises in the fact that in different States the exigencies of the service will require different styles and character of arms; some of the border States, for instance, will desire a portion of their quota in arms suited for frontier and Indian warfare, not needed perhaps in the interior States, while all will doubtless prefer the privilege of choosing what they will have. Each State is left by this amendment to its choice of arms so far as the public interest will permit, to which there can be no objection.

This bill was reported by my colleague by the unanimous direction of the Committee on Military Affairs, and has the approval of the Secretary of War and the Chief of Ordnance. Indeed, for two years past, an amendment of the act of 1808 such as is provided for in this bill has been strongly recommended in the annual reports from the War Department.

When the act to which the pending bill is an amendment was passed in 1808, the population of the United States could not have exceeded seven millions; since, by the census of 1810, it amounted to 7,239,841. The population for which provision is now sought to be made is believed to be more than six times as great, the generally received estimate being forty-five million. The $1,000,000 appropriated by this bill is less by nearly $250,000 for the present population of the United States than was $200,000 in 1808. The records of the War Department show that the organized militia in the United States numbered only 90,865, when there remains 2,875,469 unorganized. The Chief of Ordnance states in his last report that the existing appropriation of $200,000 would arm and equip only eight thousand men.

These figures show that owing to changed conditions, and especially the great increase of population, the appropriation of 1808 has become manifestly inadequate for the purpose now for which it was regarded as not more than a reasonable provision then.

Under these circumstances it is apparent that the established policy of the Government, which has always been to foster and encourage the organization of a citizen soldiery as a bulwark of defense in time of war or public danger, and the only safe reliance of the civil authority for the suppression of domestic disturbance, imperatively requires for its maintenance a more liberal appropriation.

The regular Army must always be small, indeed numerically insignificant, compared with the numbers required for defense against invasion or for a foreign war. Popular jealousy of a standing army will never permit an enlargement of the regular force beyond the indispensable requirements for a skeleton organization and for frontier defense and the care and custody of forts, arsenals, arms, and military property. It was never intended that the Army should be more than a nucleus upon which the militia, in time of war, could be rallied and organized. Citizen soldiers—I say it without disparagement of the regular Army, of which every American is proud—achieved the independence of the country, have fought its battles ever since, and are its reliance for the preservation, undimmed in the future, of the glory achieved by American arms in the past.

The country, Mr. President, desires the constitutional power of Congress for the maintenance of the militia on an efficient footing earnestly executed, for the organization and arming of the body of the militia. The American mind recognizes the strongest guarantee of safety against foreign invasion as well as domestic insurrection, for enforcement of the laws and a perpetuation of civil liberty. The national sentiment on this subject is embalmed in those clauses of the Constitution which declare "a well-regulated militia necessary to the security of a free State," which empower Congress "to provide for organizing, arming, and disciplining the militia," and "for calling forth the militia to execute the laws of the Union, suppress insurrection and repel invasions." The truth of that axiom in our political theory which denounces standing armies isolated from the citizenship of the country, under the control and command of one supreme will, as dangerous to popular liberty, is deeply imbedded in the minds and hearts of the people. Tradition, history, and experience have alike impressed it upon them. Inseparably connected with that sentiment is a just and unalterable aversion in the public mind to the employment of regular troops in aid of the civil authorities for the suppression of domestic disturbances.

The feeling is one that should be fostered and encouraged. It is in harmony with the spirit and letter of the Constitution and the genius of the Government, and as long as it exists is an impregnable bulwark around the liberties of the country. The militia is the agency specifically pointed out in article 1, section 8 of the Constitution, as well as by the common sentiment and truly American instinct of the people, for the enforcement of the laws when by reason of social disorder the arm of civil power needs to be upheld: and recent experience warns us that this great element of national strength and internal security should at once be made capable of responding to all the exigencies that may arise. The National Government has been called on many times during the last decade by individual States for aid in the conduct of domestic administration, and notably during the prevalence of the extensive riots of the past summer, for the suppression of lawless combinations beyond the control of the ordinary civil agencies. Nothing, in my judgment, is more centralizing in tendency, more destructive of that confidence which every citizen should feel in the strength, the capacity, and the stability of his home government, or more insidiously subversive of the great principle of local self-government, than these confessions of weakness and incapacity of State governments.

Sad experience has taught us as well the demoralizing effect upon the people of the States whence these appeals for aid have come, as the peril to free institutions from habitual interference by the national authority with the domestic concerns of the States. The declaration reported to have been made by the governor of Ohio last summer when the peace of his State was gravely threatened by rioters, that he "would call on the National Government for troops only after the last man in Ohio had been whipped," was worthy of the governor of a great State, and the spirit which prompted the utterance such as the governors of all the States would do well to emulate.

An organized and disciplined militia in each State properly armed and equipped will furnish a reliable home force subject to the order of the State authorities sufficient for all emergencies, and take away all occasion or necessity for calls upon the national authority for aid. The period has arrived in the history of this country when by reason of the increased and rapidly increasing density of population, with its accompanying facilities for combination by the dangerous elements of society, when the general welfare requires that each State shall be possessed of the means for maintaining law and order and the security of life and property within its borders, no higher duty rests on Congress than that of placing within the reach of the States all the constitutional resources necessary to the attainment of this end. The passage of this bill will accomplish much in that direction.

Mr. MORRILL. I hardly, think, Mr. President, that this is the appropriate time to increase the expenditures of the Government $200,000. The object aimed at, it seems to me, is one that can very well be postponed. We are not increasing the Army or the Navy, and we are appropriating very little for fortifications. Now, why should we expend this very large sum for arms that are not required by any present exigency, and which, if hereafter required, probably will have become entirely useless?

I shall move at the proper time to amend the first section by inserting $200,000 instead of "one million;" which will leave the amount as the law now stands. If that amendment shall carry, I see no objection to the remainder of the bill; but certainly it seems to me extremely inopportune at this moment to make so large an appropriation when the revenues of the Government are decreasing largely. The internal revenue up to the present time has diminished something like $5,000,000 from what it was last year, and certainly I cannot see any reason why a bill of this character should be pressed at the present time.

Mr. WHYTE. I move that the Senate now proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I hope not. This bill is one that deserves some discussion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER put the question and declared that the ayes appeared to prevail.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I shall ask for the yeas and nays if it is necessary; but I have a word to say—

Mr. HAMLIN. Oh, no; the question is not debatable.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Debate is not in order upon a motion to proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. I suppose the Chair is right about that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from West Virginia call for a division?

Mr. COKE. I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. DAVIS, of West Virginia. The yeas and nays have been demanded. This bill is worthy of discussion by the Senate, and it ought to have it.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 32, nays 18; as follows:

YEAS—32.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, April 1, 1878.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. P. HARRISON.

The Journal of Friday last was read and approved.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The morning hour begins at twenty minutes past twelve o'clock. This being Monday, the first business in order is the call of States and Territories, commencing with the State of Maine, for the introduction of bills and joint resolutions for reference to appropriate committees. Under this call joint resolutions and memorials of State and territorial Legislatures are in order.

INCREASE OF PENSIONS.

Mr. BANKS introduced a bill (H. R. No. 4147) increasing the rates of pensions to certain persons therein described; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

IN THE SENATE, March 14, 1878.

Whereas the bill known as the Wood tariff bill, now under consideration before the Ways and Means Committee of the House of Representatives, at Washington, will, if it should become a law, injuriously affect the producing and manufacturing interests of Pennsylvania; and

Whereas the agitation of this question at this time is calculated to further complicate the embarrassment of the manufacturing interest of this country, thereby increasing the distress of the people: Therefore,

Be it resolved by the senate, (the house concurring.) That any general revision of the tariff law as proposed by said bill is not demanded by the people, is most unwise, and will tend to prolong the present depressed condition of the business interests of the country.

Resolved, That we reiterate our conviction that the time is most inopportune for the agitation of any question involving the change of a law affecting the industries of the country, whereby the interests of capital and labor are in any way disturbed, jeopardized, or impaired.

Resolved, Therefore, that we hereby respectfully but most earnestly urge upon our Senators and Representatives in Congress the importance of united action on their part in opposing any change of the present tariff system, so far as the same affects the material interests of this State.

Resolved, That the governor is hereby requested to forward copies of these resolutions to our Representatives in Congress.

Extract from the journal of the Senate.

THOS. B. COCHRAN,
Chief Clerk.

IN THE HOUSE, March 20, 1878.

Resident Clerk, House of Representatives.

The foregoing resolutions concurred in.

Approved the 25th day of March, A. D. 1878.

J. F. HARTRANFT.

EXAMINATION OF PUBLIC PRINTING OFFICE.

Mr. FINLEY. I ask unanimous consent to offer for adoption the following resolution:

Resolved, That the subcommittee on public expenditures engaged in an examination of the Public Printing Office be authorized to have the testimony printed for the use of the committee as it progresses in said investigation.

Mr. CONGER. I desire to ask the gentleman why the subcommittee should have their testimony printed separately?

Mr. FINLEY. This is a subcommittee taking testimony in regard to the public printing. The request is that this testimony be printed for the use of the committee.

There being no objection, the resolution was considered and adopted.

PURCHASE OF STEAMSHIPS FOR THE GOVERNMENT.

Mr. WILLIS, of New York. I ask unanimous consent to submit for adoption the resolution which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be, and is hereby, directed to send to this House the names, age, capacity, and general condition of the steamships purchased of and owned in part or whole by Marshal O. Roberts, of New York, with the amount paid for each, (in 1862-63 or thereabouts); also, the names of the attorney or agent to whom the money was paid, and by whose authority the money was paid; also, copies of any correspondence between the Quartermaster-General, Montgomery C. Meigs, and the then Secretary of War, Stanton, relative to the actual value and general condition of the said steamships.

Mr. PRICE. Should not this inquiry be addressed to the Secretary of the Navy?

Mr. WILLIS, of New York. No, sir; these vessels were purchased through the Quartermaster-General's Office.

There being no objection, the resolution was considered and adopted.

WAR CLAIMS.

Mr. HARTZELL, by unanimous consent, introduced a joint resolution (H. R. No. 150) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States forbidding the assumption or payment of any claim for loss or damage growing out of the taking, use, or destruction of property within the limits of the States engaged in the late rebellion; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

SEIZURE OF STEAMER VIRGINIUS.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a message from the President of the United States, transmitting, in compliance with a resolution of the House of Representatives of the 21st ultimo, a report from the Secretary of State, with copies of correspondence between the Government of the United States and Spain relative to the seizure of the steamer Virginus; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

PUBLIC BUILDINGS IN SAN FRANCISCO.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, in response to a resolution of the 19th ultimo asking information as to the use now being made of the custom-house and old appraisers' store in San Francisco, and the use proposed to be made of the new appraisers' building now in process of erection; which was referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to Mr. CANON, of Utah, for two weeks from to-morrow, on account of important business;

To Mr. ROBINSON, of Massachusetts, for three days, on account of important business; and

To Mr. OLIVER, for two weeks, on account of important business.

TEMPORARY CLERKS, ETC.

Mr. DURHAM. I move to suspend the rules for the purpose of taking up and considering at this time the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 3102) authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to employ temporary clerks, and making appropriation for the same; also making appropriations for detecting trespass on public lands, and for bringing into market public lands in certain States, and for other purposes.

Mr. CONGER. Is the gentleman entitled to make that motion now?

The SPEAKER. He is, but it will require a two-third vote to suspend the rules.

Mr. CONGER. The practice of the Chair would not let such a motion come in now, as I understand it.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has always stated to the House he would on Monday recognize any gentleman desiring to proceed to the consideration of general bills of the session, but that will require a two-third vote. Such has been the uniform practice.

Mr. SAYLER. The Chair has always made an exception in favor of public bills.

The SPEAKER. That is so.

Mr. DURHAM's motion was agreed to; and the rules were accordingly suspended.

Mr. DURHAM. I am directed by the Committee on Appropriations, to whom was referred the amendments of the Senate to a bill (H. R. No. 3102) authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to employ temporary clerks and making an appropriation for the same; also making appropriations for detecting trespass on public lands, and for bringing into market public lands in certain States, and for other purposes, to report the same back to the House with the recommendation that the sixth amendment of the Senate be concurred in and that all the others be non-concurred in. I demand the previous question on the report of the committee.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question will be first put on the sixth amendment of the Senate, in which concurrence has been recommended.

The Clerk read as follows:

After the words "public lands" insert as follows:

And provided further, That where wood and timber lands in the Territories of the United States are not surveyed and offered for sale in proper subdivisions, convenient of access, no money herein appropriated shall be used to collect any charge for wood or timber cut on the public lands in the Territories of the United States for the use of actual settlers in the Territories, and not for export from the Territories of the United States where the timber grew: And provided further, That if any timber cut on the public lands shall be exported from the Territories of the United States, it shall be liable to seizure by United States authority, wherever found.

The amendment was concurred in.

Mr. DURHAM. I move non-concurrence in all the other amendments.

The SPEAKER. If it be the wish of the House the question will be put upon the remaining Senate amendments in gross.

Mr. DUNNELL. Is it in order to move concurrence in any one of the amendments?

The SPEAKER. That is the question before the House. Does the gentleman ask for a separate vote?

Mr. DUNNELL. I demand a separate vote on the first amendment.

The SPEAKER. The Committee on Appropriations recommend non-concurrence in that amendment.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Oregon. We are acting here without knowledge. I have sent for a copy of this bill and have not been able to get it. We are, I think, unnecessarily precipitate in our action on these amendments.

Mr. DURHAM. The gentleman can send for the bills, as they are on file with the Senate amendments. It is not my fault that gentlemen do not get them.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Oregon. I have not asked the gentleman for information. I applied to the Speaker. I have listened to dictation from that source long enough.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the first amendment of the Senate, which will be read by the Clerk, a separate vote having been demanded by the gentleman from Minnesota, [Mr. DUNNELL.]

Mr. DUNNELL. I hope, Mr. Speaker, that the amendment will be concurred in.

Mr. DURHAM. The Committee on Appropriations have recommended non-concurrence.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out "not exceeding twenty;" so it will read: That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized to employ temporary clerks during the balance of the present fiscal year, &c.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 67, noes 76.

Mr. DUNNELL demanded tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. DUNNELL and Mr. DURHAM were appointed.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 93, noes 80. Mr. DURHAM demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. DURHAM. The committee recommend non-concurrence in that amendment. The Senate propose to strike out the appropriation of $6,500 made by the House and to make it $20,000.

Mr. CONGER. I object to debate. The gentleman has demanded the previous question and cut off all explanation of these amendments.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 100, nays 119, not voting 72; as follows:

The result of the vote was then announced as above recorded.

Mr. DURHAM moved to reconsider the vote by which the amendment of the Senate was non-concurred in; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The second amendment of the Senate, in which the Committee on Appropriations recommended non-concurrence, was read, as follows:

Strike out these words:

At a rate not exceeding $2 per day each: Provided, That the whole sum to be expended for this purpose shall not exceed $6,500.

And insert in lieu thereof:

And that the sum of $20,000 be, and the same is hereby, appropriated for that purpose.

The amendment was non-concurred in.

The third amendment of the Senate, in which the Committee on Appropriations recommended non-concurrence, was read, as follows:

Add to section 1 the following:

Contingent expenses, Treasury Department:

For care and subsistence of horses for office and mail wagons, including feeding and shoeing, and for wagons, harness, and repairs of the same, being a deficiency for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1878, $2,000.

The amendment was non-concurred in.

The fourth amendment of the Senate, in which the Committee on Appropriations recommended non-concurrence, was read, as follows:

Add to section 1 the following:

For gas, drop-lights and tubing, gas-burners, brackets and globes, candles, lanterns, and wicks, being a deficiency for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1878, $2,500.

The amendment was non-concurred in.

The fifth amendment of the Senate, in which the Committee on Appropriations recommended non-concurrence, was read, as follows:

In section 2 strike out these words:

Mr. JONES, of Alabama. I move concurrence in that amendment.

Add to section 3 the following:

For salaries and expenses of collectors of internal revenue, being a deficiency for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1878, $40,000.

Mr. SAMPSON. I move to concur in that amendment.

Mr. DURHAM. I desire to state that that $40,000 is allowed in another bill.

Mr. SAMPSON. As the House has passed this amendment once, I see no objection to having it here. This bill will become a law before the other, and there is a necessity for immediate action.

The question being taken on concurring in the amendment, there were ayes 38, noes not counted.

So the amendment was non-concurred in.

The eighth amendment of the Senate was read, as follows:

The ninth amendment of the Senate, in which the Committee on Appropriations recommended non-concurrence, was read, as follows:

Add to section 3 the following:

That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized to employ in the record and pension division of the Surgeon-General's Office, during the balance of the present fiscal year, the following clerks and laborers in addition to the clerical force already provided by law, namely: One clerk of class 4; one clerk of class 3; two clerks of class 2; twenty-eight clerks of class 1; and two laborers, at $720 each, and the sum of $11,902.30, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated for that purpose.

Mr. SAMPSON. I move concurrence in that amendment.

Mr. DURHAM. I desire to make a statement, if the House will listen to me half a minute.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Oregon. The previous question is operating, and I object.

During the roll-call the following announcements were made:

Mr. SCALES. My colleague, Mr. STEELE, is absent by leave of the House, and is paired with Mr. HAYES, of Illinois.

Mr. FOSTER. I am paired with the gentleman from North Carolina, Mr. WADDELL, upon all political questions; not regarding this as such, I vote "ay."

Mr. BAKER, of New York. Upon all political questions my colleagues, Mr. CAMP and Mr. BENEDICT, are paired. If Mr. CAMP were present, he would vote "ay," and from my knowledge of Mr. BENEDICT I think he would also vote "ay."

Mr. HENDERSON. I am requested to state that my colleague, Mr. HAYES, is paired with Mr. STEELE, of North Carolina. If Mr. HAYES were present, he would vote "ay."

Mr. PATTERSON, of Colorado. I am paired upon this question with Mr. ERRETT.

Mr. STRAIT. I am paired with Mr. WILLIAMS, of Delaware, on all political questions. Not considering this such, I vote "ay."

The result of the vote was then announced as above stated.

Mr. RICE, of Ohio, moved to reconsider the vote by which the ninth amendment was concurred in; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. DURHAM moved to reconsider the several votes by which the amendments of the Senate had been concurred in and non-concurred in; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ARREARS OF PENSIONS.

Mr. CUMMINGS. I move that the rules be suspended and the bill which I send to the Clerk's desk be passed.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill to provide that all pensions on account of death, or wounds received, or disease contracted in the service of the United States during the late war of the rebellion, which have been granted, or which shall hereafter be granted, shall commence from the date of death or discharge from the service of the United States; for the payment of arrears of pensions and other purposes.

Be it enacted, &c. That all pensions which have been granted under the general laws regulating pensions, or may hereafter be in consequence of death from a cause which originated in the United States service during the continuance of the late war of the rebellion, or in consequence of wounds, injuries, or disease, received or contracted in said service during said war of the rebellion, shall commence from the date of the death or discharge from said service of the person on whose account the claim has been or shall hereafter be granted, or from the termination of the right of the party having prior title to such pension: Provided, The rate of pension for the intervening time for which arrears of pension are hereby granted shall be the same per month for which the pension was originally granted.

SEC. 2. That the Commissioner of Pensions is hereby authorized and directed to adopt such rules and regulations for the payment of the arrears of pensions hereby granted as will be necessary to cause to be paid to such pensioners, or if the pensioners shall have died, to the person or persons entitled to the same, all such arrears of pension as the pensioner may be or would have been entitled to under this act.

SEC. 3. That section 4717 of the Revised Statutes of the United States which provides that "no claim for pension not prosecuted to a successful issue within five years from the date of filing the same shall be admitted without record-evidence from the War or Navy Department of the injury or the disease which resulted in the disability or death of the person on whose account the claim is made: Provided, That in any case in which the limitation prescribed by this section bars the further prosecution of the claim, the claimant may present, through the Pension Office, to the Adjutant-General of the Army or the Surgeon-General of the Navy, evidence that the disease or injury which resulted in the disability or death of the person on whose account the claim is made originated in the service and in the line of duty; and if such evidence is deemed satisfactory by the officer to whom it may be submitted, he shall cause a record of the fact so proved to be made, and a copy of the same to be transmitted to the Commissioner of Pensions, and the bar to the prosecution of the claim shall thereby be removed," be, and the same is hereby, repealed.

SEC. 4. That all acts or parts of acts so far as they may conflict with the provisions of this act be, and the same are hereby, repealed.

Mr. BEEBE. I would like to ask the gentleman from Iowa if he is prepared to state how many hundreds of millions of dollars this bill will take out of the Treasury?

Mr. CUMMINGS. Is debate in order?

Mr. BEEBE. I simply rise to make an inquiry.

Mr. CUMMINGS. I object to any inquiry unless it is a parliamentary one, and that of course should not be addressed to me.

Mr. RICE, of Ohio. I ask that the bill be referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

The SPEAKER. That motion is not in order; the motion of the gentleman from Iowa is to suspend the rules and pass the bill.

Mr. RICE, of Ohio. I wish to state to the House—

Mr. CUMMINGS. I object to any debate whatever.

Mr. BEEBE. I desire to make an inquiry of the Chair.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman can make any parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. BEEBE. I would respectfully inquire of the gentleman from Iowa through the Chair how many millions of dollars this would take from the Treasury?

The SPEAKER. That is in the nature of an argument why the bill should not pass; the Chair cannot entertain it.

Mr. BEEBE. Then I withdraw it.

Mr. CLYMER. Would it be parliamentary to inquire whether this bill has been considered by any committee of the House?

The SPEAKER. The Chair cannot answer that question.

Mr. RICE, of Ohio. It has not.

Mr. CUMMINGS. I insist upon the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The regular order is the motion to suspend the rules and pass the bill which has been read.

Mr. McMAHON. I desire to inquire of the gentleman how this bill compares with the bill which has already been reported—

The SPEAKER. That is in the nature of debate.

Mr. CUMMINGS. I ask for the yeas and nays on my motion.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. RICE, of Ohio. I move that the House now adjourn, and on that motion I call the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 75, nays 148, not voting 58; as follows:

So the motion to adjourn was not agreed to.

During the call of the roll the following announcements were made:

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. My colleagues, Mr. PRIDEMORE and Mr. JORGENSEN, are paired on all political questions. Mr. PRIDEMORE is detained at home by illness in his family.

Mr. FOSTER. I am paired on all political questions with Mr. WADDELL, of North Carolina. As I do not regard this a political question, I will vote in the negative.

Mr. PATTERSON, of Colorado. I am paired with Mr. ERRETT, of Pennsylvania.

Mr. MARTIN. I am paired with Mr. HUBBELL, of Michigan.

The result of the vote was then announced as above stated.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of its clerks, informed the House that the Senate had passed, without amendment, a joint resolution of the House of the following title:

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 142) making an appropriation for filling up, draining, and placing in good sanitary condition the grounds south of the Capitol along the line of the old canal, and for other purposes.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed, with amendments in which the concurrence of the House was requested, a bill of the House of the following title:

A bill (H. R. No. 3987) to regulate the advertising of mail-lettings.

The message further announced that the Senate had passed and requested the concurrence of the House in a bill of the following title:

A bill (S. No. 1014) requiring the commissioner for preparing and publishing a new edition of the Revised Statutes of the United States to revise and perfect the index to the first volume of the same.

ARREARS OF PENSIONS.

The question recurred on the motion of Mr. CUMMINGS to suspend the rules and pass the bill indicated by him.

Mr. SPRINGER. Has this bill been reported from the Committee on Invalid Pensions?

Mr. RICE, of Ohio. It has not been; the committee have matured a bill of like import.

Mr. CUMMINGS. I object to debate and insist on the regular order.

Mr. SPRINGER. In order that we may have an opportunity to ascertain what this bill is, I move that the House now adjourn.

The SPEAKER. That motion is not now in order.

Mr. SPRINGER. Business has intervened since the last motion to adjourn was decided.

The SPEAKER. What business?

Mr. SPRINGER. The bill has been read.

The SPEAKER. That was for the information of the House.

Mr. BEEBE. Has not the House received a message from the Senate since the last motion to adjourn? And is not that business of so much importance that it even necessitates the chairman of the Committee of the Whole leaving the chair?

The SPEAKER. The Chair will direct the Clerk to read Rule 161, which is very plain.

The Clerk read as follows:

Pending a motion to suspend the rules, the Speaker may entertain one motion that the House do now adjourn; but after the result thereon is announced he shall not entertain any other dilatory motion till the vote is taken on suspension.

Mr. SPRINGER. A motion to adjourn is not necessarily a dilatory motion.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read from page 151 of the Digest.

The Clerk read as follows:

A motion to adjourn may be repeated, although no question has been put or decided since the former motion, but there must have been some intervening business. Another motion submitted, progress in debate, or reading a paper by the Clerk, an order of the yeas and nays, &c., has been considered "such intervening business" as will authorize the repetition of the motion to adjourn.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not think that a message from the Senate ever has been considered as "intervening business" in the sense of the rule.

Mr. SPRINGER. The reading of the bill is intervening business according to the rule.

The SPEAKER. The bill was read for the information of the House, being the bill upon which the House was about to vote, and it was entirely within the right of any single member to call for its reading.

Mr. WILSON. I desire to ask the gentleman offering this bill one question.

Mr. CUMMINGS. Regular order!

The SPEAKER. The gentleman declines to answer the question, and demands the regular order. The Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 146, nays 76, not voting 69; as follows:

Mr. FOSTER. I move that the House now take a recess.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at four o'clock and thirty minutes p. m.) the House took a recess until half past seven o'clock p. m.

EVENING SESSION.

The House reassembled at half past seven o'clock p. m.

The SPEAKER. By order of the House, the House this evening is in session as in Committee of the Whole for debate only, no business whatever to be transacted. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. PRICE] will occupy the chair as Speaker pro tempore.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. PHELPS. Mr. Speaker, I rise for a personal explanation. In the printed testimony which accompanies the report of the Committee on Civil Service Reform upon certain charges some time since preferred against the Doorkeeper of this House, I notice some allusions to his New England appointments, and to the action of myself and one or two other Representatives from New England with reference to them. I had no opportunity to appear before the committee, and until within a few days, and long since the close of the investigation and the publication of the testimony, had no knowledge of the statements which had been made. When they were brought to my attention I asked of the committee the privilege of testifying, and was informed it was then too late and advised to make my statement to the House, which I have been waiting to do when the report came up for consideration. The House on Thursday last refused to consider the report, and the chairman informs me it is very uncertain when it will be taken up. I therefore now ask the indulgence of the House for a few moments.

The matter to which I particularly wish to call attention has only an unimportant bearing on the question of the official propriety of Mr. Polk, and is not even noticed by the committee in their report, and I make the explanation only for the purpose of correcting several misstatements with reference to myself, my colleague, [Mr. LANDERS,] and my friend from New Hampshire, [Mr. JONES,] which appear in the printed document purporting to contain the testimony taken in the case.

So far as I have any knowledge of those appointments and of any matters connected with them, it is briefly this: immediately after Mr. Polk's nomination Mr. Holt called on me and stated that he was a friend of Mr. Polk and had assisted him in his canvass for the nomination, and that with the indorsement of the Connecticut delegation he could have an appointment as messenger. Upon this statement I was satisfied no other person from my district could obtain a place, and I interested myself so far as to procure the indorsement he asked for, and he was appointed.

The matter remained in that condition until, in consequence of an excess of appointments by the Doorkeeper, it became necessary to reduce the number and revise the roll, when I was shown by Mr. Polk a printed list, giving to New England three appointments, namely, a soldier, a fireman, and a laborer. On this list the name of Mr. Holt appeared as a soldier and Mr. Prescott, of New Hampshire, and Mr. McDowell, of Connecticut, as fireman and laborer. I immediately stated to Mr. Polk that I thought Holt was incorrectly designated as a soldier, and that unless the mistake was corrected it would lead both himself and Holt into difficulty. He said Holt represented to him that he was a soldier and was entitled to that designation. I replied that I would see him and ascertain positively about it. I did so and found that my impression was correct. I reported at once to Mr. Polk, and he promptly made the necessary change by substituting the name of Prescott for that of Holt and entering Holt as fireman. In first placing Holt on the soldiers' roll, I have no doubt he acted in good faith. After the change was made, which considerably reduced the compensation of Holt, I stated to him I was confident Mr. Polk had done the best he could for him, and advised him to be satisfied. He said the pay was small, but he thought an arrangement could be made with McDowell and Prescott to equalize their salaries and have it satisfactory to them all.

Now, right in this place I wish to refer to the printed report of the testimony on page 100, in which Mr. Polk is represented as saying that he had several interviews with my colleague and myself in which we said to him that we would oblige Holt, Prescott, and McDonnell to equalize their compensation. I am unwilling to believe that Mr. Polk intended to misstate the facts and misrepresent my colleague and myself. In the number of his appointments, the variety of circumstances attending them, and the constant solicitation, annoyance, and vexation he experienced, it is not strange that he should have failed several months afterward to accurately remember with regard to this particular case. It is perhaps more strange that he should have been able to correctly remember and relate so much connected with the numerous parties and transactions involved in the difficult administration of his office. The truth, however, so far as I am concerned, is that there were no such interviews and statements, and my colleague assures me he knew of none and in that part of his testimony Mr. Polk is entirely in error. What he there says about another and prior agreement between Prescott and McDonnell to divide their compensation equally is something of which I never before heard and have no knowledge.

That whatever arrangements were entered into with regard to exchanging duties and equalizing pay were purely voluntary, and suggested and made wholly by and among the appointees, without the intervention of Mr. Polk, and without the advice, participation, or influence of any one else, seems clearly established. McDonnell and Prescott both testify to it. Holt appears to have stated differently, but in a recent conversation with me, in which I called his attention to the printed statement of his testimony, he said he was incorrectly reported, and was willing at any time to make affidavit that the arrangement was in fact entirely voluntary and among themselves, and that no one else suggested or advised or had any part in making it. I never saw Prescott but once, and then he was simply introduced to me, and nothing was said on this subject; and I never exchanged a word with either himself, McDonnell, or Holt with reference to any arrangement about their pay, and never counseled or advised any. My colleague informs me that the paper which was drawn by him after the parties had concluded their arrangement was written at the request of Prescott, and for the sole purpose of furnishing and preserving evidence of their mutual agreement in the event of a future misunderstanding between them.

The agreement appears to have been perfectly voluntary and satisfactory between the appointees, and so far as I can see was fair and just and was one which for their mutual interest and convenience they had both a legal and moral right to make. It can certainly reflect no discredit on Mr. Polk, and the committee have not found that it does; and having been made without the advice or participation of the gentlemen who as members of this House recommended those persons for appointment they cannot be justly prejudiced by it.

ORDER OF DEBATE.

Mr. ELLSWORTH. I am willing to yield to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINGS] if I can have the floor after him and do not lose my place beyond reach.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. If the gentleman he is yielding to is to occupy an hour, I object, unless his name is down upon the list before mine.

Mr. ELLSWORTH. I only change places with him; that is all. It will not make any difference so far as the gentleman from Alabama is concerned.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The names of the gentleman from Michigan and of the gentleman from Iowa are down before the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. ELLSWORTH. It is only changing places.

SHALL SOUTHERN WAR CLAIMS BE PAID?

Mr. CUMMINGS. Mr. Speaker, we have loud and frequent professions of a desire to economize the expenditure of the people's money, and to reduce the burden of taxation, coming from the other side of this House. We have heard it time and again, loudest when the Army and Navy are under consideration, weakest when we have before us bills looking to the payment of southern claims, southern mail contractors, or voting money to be expended in that portion of our country lately in rebellion.

The other side of this House is striving with might and main to restore to the pension-roll pensioners of the Mexican war who were dropped because of their disloyalty, and this very day the democrats of this House defeated a proposition I had the honor to offer, to grant arrears of pensions to crippled and infirm Union soldiers, their widows and orphans.

Sir, it is time the country knows, if it does not already, of the thousands of demands growing out of the late civil war, or for the special advantage of Southern States, now made upon the Government. Why, Mr. Speaker, we are talking of repealing the bankrupt law, but if these claims and demands or a tithe of them are to be paid, it is time we were enacting a bankrupt law for the nation, for their payment will not only bankrupt the national Treasury, but half the taxpayers of the country. Deluge—ay, that is the right word—a deluge of claims has come upon us. Mr. Delano, afterward Secretary of the Interior, when a member of this House truly said, speaking of the payment of these claims:

It would result, I think, in shaking the credit of the nation. It would place us in a condition of liability, I imagine, vastly beyond our capacity of endurance.

I could not, sir, enumerate them all if I would; and, if I could, the hour allotted me would not be sufficient for the purpose.

STATEMENT OF THE SOUTHERN DEMANDS.

Permit me to particularize but a portion of them:

First came the demand for $18,000 for the use during the war of a mill at Alexandria, Virginia.

Then the bill restoring to the pension-roll Mexican pensioners who were dropped because of their disloyalty.

The joint resolution to pay southern mail-contractors $375,000 was fought for with savage energy. Defeated once in the House, it is again before the Committee of Claims.

A bill is before us proposing to restore to those who were in rebellion, on payment of principal, interest, and costs, their real estate the title to which vested in the Government under the laws it passed for the collection of taxes. This would restore to the heirs of the confederate leader, Lee, Arlington Heights, the burial-ground of the nation's patriotic dead, over whom is raised the nation's tablet bearing these everlasting words:

On fame's eternal camping-ground
Their silent tents are spread,
And glory guards with solemn round
The bivouac of the dead.

The Texas Pacific scheme, for the especial benefit of the South, represents $30,000,000 or more.

Bills are pending for improvements of southern rivers and harbors, other than the Mississippi River, appropriating over $5,000,000.

The refunding of the cotton tax involves $68,000,000.

I give, in the following table, the amounts which would go to certain States under the bill:

Alabama	$10,388,072 10
Arkansas	2,535,638 43
Florida	918,944 38
Georgia	11,897,694 38
Kentucky	553,337 45
Louisiana	10,098,501 00
Maryland	51,349 52
Mississippi	8,742,985 93
Missouri	592,098 36
North Carolina	1,959,704 87
South Carolina	4,172,420 16
Tennessee	7,873,460 71
Texas	5,510,401 25
Virginia	825,856 87
Iowa, (my own State)	27

The establishment of the doctrine now urged, that amnesty and pardon restores the right to compensation for the value of cotton seized by the Government, means how many millions upon millions? No one can tell. A bill is pending providing specifically for the payment for cotton seized since May 29, 1865, shortening the date now fixed as the end of the war, and it involves a large amount.

The demand for compensation for tobacco likewise seized is already looming up. Claims to the amount of over $25,000,000 are pending before the southern claims commission.

The clamor for remission of the Federal tax imposed upon the Southern States, but not paid, will not be forgotten. A bill is before us to return such portion of that tax as has been paid by citizens of States which were in rebellion. Twelve thousand claims are pending in the Quartermaster-General's Office. I cannot tell how many are before the Departments.

The amount covered into the Treasury February 27, 1874, for captured and abandoned property was $24,251,269. All this has found or will find claimants, and an effort is being made for its distribution by law. I am assured there were pending before the Committee on War Claims of this House on the 4th of March this year nearly twelve hundred special relief bills for independent war claimants from Southern States, involving the amounts stated:

Alabama	$127,885
Arkansas	384,000
District of Columbia	156,000
Florida	32,000
Georgia	463,652
Kentucky	620,490
Louisiana	411,610
Maryland	228,254

Mississippi	189,908
Missouri	124,588
North Carolina	175,661
Tennessee	724,676
Texas	673,376
Virginia	232,662
West Virginia	247,730

And the end is not yet, for on every bill-day the number increases with wonderful rapidity.

It has been said our southern brethren wanted a "peace." Does it not look as if they were after the whole?

What means the antagonism to the southern claims commission? Is it because it is necessary to establish loyalty in that tribunal? Why propose an enlargement of the time for filing claims growing out of the war? Why attempt to designate an earlier date than now named as the end of the rebellion?

Is it not time for the country to become alarmed, and see to it that this House—as the other branch of the legislative department, after March 4, 1879, passes, without a doubt, under the control of the democracy—that this House has returned to it a majority of that party which resists this flood of claims? Is the defunct confederacy to be permitted in this way to make good the losses caused by the war? Is it to provide the means for such payment the democracy has, in the name of economy, in times like these, suspended necessary work upon public buildings and public enterprises, and, by throwing laborers idle, helped to make the cry for employment more loud?

As a step in the direction of paying these claims, is that the reason an effort is being made to repeal the law which provides that no one who aided the rebellion shall have a place upon the pension-roll; to declare by solemn enactment of law that hereafter loyalty shall in all cases be presumed?

A PRECEDENT TO BE MADE.

That the losses resulting from the war may find a legislative precedent for payment, it is sought under the guise of the Mexican pension bill to establish the doctrine that those who aided the rebellion are restored to all their lost rights; that the Constitution guarantees to those who are or were disloyal full compensation for property captured during war by the Government or used or destroyed by its armies?

The theory so ingeniously advanced by the Pension Committee will do this.

That report first asserts that the pensioners who were dropped from the pension-roll because of disloyalty have a property right in their pensions. The committee says:

The pensions of soldiers disabled in the line of duty are in no sense a gratuity. * * * It has every ingredient of a contract * * * and became a perfect vested right, as much as any bond he may have held on the Government or other choses in action which he may have owned.

Then, upon the effect of the general pardon granted by President Johnson in 1868, the committee adds:

It released them (those who were disloyal) not only from all penalties incurred by reason of their "participation in the rebellion against the authority of the United States," but it absolutely and forever "blotted out," "obliterated" and effaced the offense—

Wonderful admission!

the offense itself, and made them, in contemplation of law, wholly "innocent" and loyal citizens.

If it be true, as claimed, (but more of this hereafter,) that pardon closes the judicial eye, it is fortunate, indeed, that the Legislature did not go blind.

DEMANDED AS A CONSTITUTIONAL RIGHT.

The committee then makes this astounding declaration:

The obligation of the Government to pay the invalid soldiers of the South—

Those who fought, some for but fourteen days, to save the nation they for four long years afterward sought to destroy; who helped to impose upon the country our billions of national debt; who made necessary our grievous taxation; who precipitated upon our people the financial crisis now carrying so much of suffering to them.

But to return to the report:

The obligation of the Government to pay the invalid soldiers of the South their pensions for their disabilities incurred in its defense is as sacred and obligatory as its engagement to the widows and orphans of the soldiers who fell in the UNION ARMY. * * * Neither can be refused without national perfidy.

Is the country ready to make such a precedent? Will it submit to the establishment of the doctrine that pardon reinvests the title to property captured during the war in its former owner; that the Constitution provides that property taken by the Government for public use under such circumstances shall be paid for, that the "wholly innocent and loyal (by grace) citizen" shall have compensation; that every rail taken after a long and toilsome march through mud and rain, when no other fuel was at hand to build a fire to cook a cup of coffee or warm half-frozen soldiers, the Government shall pay for; that when rebel cavalry captured supply trains and our details drove in cattle or hogs to supply the loss and feed our soldiers, that these cattle and hogs shall be paid for; that when mules and horses had given out after long marches and much hard work, and their places were supplied by those taken by quartermasters from plantations whose owners were wearing the gray, they shall be paid for; that rent shall be paid for houses used to shelter sick or wounded or dying soldiers of the Republic; that cotton piled up as a breastwork to shield the boys in blue from the rifle-ball of its owner shall be compensated for? I might go further, but I have gone far enough.

Those who sustained the Government in its great struggle are not ready for such an interpretation of law, nor to establish a precedent for such a following, and it is time their Representatives should awaken those who have been lulled to sleep by the siren song of "conciliation" to the dangers before them. They are willing to let bygones be bygones; they are willing to extend the hand of welcome back to loyalty; they are willing to greet you as brothers and move on together for a grander future for our common country; they are willing to "conciliate," but are not willing that the conciliation shall all be upon one side, and they will never—no, never—acknowledge that the gray was right; the wrong, the blue.

But, sir, is it true that the Government is under moral or legal obligation to pay these claims? Does the fifth amendment to the Constitution provide that war claims of this character shall be paid? I undertake to answer each of these questions in the negative, and I shall give my reasons therefor.

THE LAWS OF WAR RECOGNIZED BY THE CONSTITUTION.

The Constitution itself recognizes that when the condition of war exists martial law is constitutional law. Whiting, in his War Powers, (page 56,) thus states it:

In war, when martial law is in force, the laws of war are the laws which the Constitution expressly authorizes and requires to be enforced. The Constitution, when it calls into action martial law, for the time changes civil rights, or rights which the citizen would be entitled to in peace, because the rights of persons in one of these cases are totally incompatible with the obligations of persons in the other.

In other words, martial law, or the laws of war, when in force, are constitutional laws. You may assume, instead, that the Constitution recognizes during a state of war a law higher than itself, and it will only strengthen my argument. There are many authorities going to that extent. I may quote some of them.

Many rights held sacred by the Constitution are held in abeyance when war is raging. Freedom of speech may be suspended, freedom of the press interfered with, life taken without trial by jury, property seized without due process of law.

Here, then—

Says Lawrence, in his Law of Claims, (page 215)— in the Constitution are two systems of laws, each having a purpose.

Says Whiting, (War Powers, page 51:)

Both systems of law cannot have full or exclusive force, effect, and operation at the same time and place over the same rights of persons and property.

On this Mr. Lawrence, in his Law of Claims, (page 216,) thus comments:

But where war is actually flagrant, or a state of war and the exercise of military authority exist, the laws of war prevail.

The Government of the United States recognized this doctrine when it clothed Andrew Johnson with military power, creating him an officer of the Army and appointing him military governor of Tennessee. The same was true when Mr. Stanley was made the provisional military governor of North Carolina. Other instances might be cited. The Articles of War for the government of the Army are a recognition thereof by the Congress of the United States. The President's proclamation of August 16, 1861, was based upon the idea that at war the civil law gives place to the laws of war.

The supreme court of Pennsylvania said as early as 1788, (1 Dallas, 362:)

Many things are lawful in that season (flagrante bello) which would not be permitted in time of peace.

The supreme court of Georgia held, (9 Georgia, 348:)

Those who seize the property are not trespassers, and there is no relief but by petition to the Legislature. * * * For example, the pulling down of houses and raising bulwarks for the defense of the State against the enemy; seizing corn and other provisions for the sustenance of an army in time of war; or taking cotton bales, as General Jackson did at New Orleans, to build ramparts against an invading foe.

The supreme court of New Jersey decided, (3 Zab., 605:)

The right arising out of extreme necessity is a natural right older than States. * * * It is the right of self-defense, of self-preservation, and has no connection whatever with the right of eminent domain. The one may be fettered by constitutional limitations; the other is beyond the reach of constitutions.

Says Whiting, (War Powers, p. 46:)

The law of nations is above the constitution of any government.

It is, then, to the law of nations we are to look, rather than to the Constitution, to determine whether these war claims are or are not in all good conscience to be paid.

THE REBELLION WAS A WAR.

The pertinent questions are: (1) Was the late rebellion a war? (2) Is a civil war governed by the law of nations? (3) What is the law of nations so far as the same is applicable to the question before us?

1. Was the late rebellion a war?

I need spend but few words upon this proposition. The Supreme Court in the prize cases, reported in 2 Black, 636, expressly held that the country was in a state of war. It was so recognized by the laws of Congress, foreign treaties, and by the executive authority of the United States.

2. Does the law of nations govern a civil war?

Vattel, in his Law of Nations, (section 374,) says:

Whenever a numerous party thinks it has a right to resist the sovereign, and finds itself able to declare that opinion, sword in hand, the war is to be carried on between them in the same manner as between two different nations.

Our Supreme Court has held, (2 Black, 636 :))

The present civil war between the United States and the so-called Confederate States has such a character and magnitude as to give the United States the same rights and powers which they might exercise in case of a national or foreign war.

Again:

It is not the less a civil war, with belligerent parties in hostile array, because it may be called an "insurrection" by one side, and the insurgents be considered as rebels or traitors.

The courts go further than this, even to say that rebels in a civil war are entitled to less rights than the foreign enemy. Lawrence states it thus, (Law of Claims, page 211:)

It may be proper to say, first, however, that the power of a nation over its own rebel citizens is greater in a civil war than over alien enemies, because over the former it "may exercise both belligerent and sovereign rights," [citing 2 Black 633, 4 Cranch 272:] that is, the belligerent rights of war, and the sovereign right to confiscate and punish for treason, while over alien enemies it can only exercise belligerent rights.

3. What is the law of nations?

Justice Grier, in the prize cases heretofore cited, says:

The law of nations is also called the law of nature; it is founded on the common consent as well as the common sense of the world.

Whiting adds, (War Powers, 47:)

In the great tribunal of nations there is a "higher law" than that which has been framed by either one of them, however sacred to each its own peculiar laws and constitution of government may be.

WHAT IS THE LAW OF NATIONS?

What, then, is the law of "common sense" bearing upon these war claims? What may a nation do in civil war? What are the laws of war?

Vattel gives this answer, (section 161:)

A nation has the right to deprive the enemy (still more one in insurrection against his government) for his possessions and goods. * * * All movable things belong to the sovereign making war. * * * His soldiers, and even the auxiliaries, are only instruments in his hands for asserting his rights.

Halleck says:

War * * * gives to one belligerent the right to deprive the other of everything which might add to his strength and enable him to carry on hostilities. (Page 447.)

In the first place we may seize upon private property by way of penalty for the illegal acts of individuals or of the community to which they belong. (Ib., ch. 19, section 14.)

In the second place we have a right to make the enemy's country contribute to the expenses of the war. (Ib., ch. 19, section 15.)

Says an eminent writer:

It seems clear that on the principles of the laws of war—the generally accepted law of nations—the Government has the right in an insurrectionary district or an "enemy's country" to take and use whatever may be necessary for the convenience or support of the army.

In the treaty of peace between the United States and Great Britain, following the Revolutionary war, two articles were agreed upon providing that further hostilities to the Tories should cease and that Congress should earnestly recommend to the States the restitution of their estates to such persons as could be proved to be real British subjects and such Americans as had not borne arms against the United States. This speaks volumes upon the question of the right to seize the estates of rebels and enemies and its duty to make compensation.

The gentleman from Massachusetts, [General BUTLER,] in a letter written to Hon. William Lawrence, then a member of this House, in 1874, said:

An army cannot hold a city without occupying some portion of it; and if they do so that is one of the incidents of war, and gives no contract, explicit or implied, against the Government of the occupying army.

The Supreme Court of the United States held, (2 Black, 671, 674:)

The right of one belligerent not only to coerce the other by direct force, but also to cripple his resources by the seizure or destruction of his property, is a necessary result of a state of war. Money and wealth, the products of agriculture and commerce, are said to be sinews of war, and as necessary in its conduct as numbers and physical force.

THE AMERICAN DOCTRINE.

Alexander Hamilton thus stated the early American doctrine upon this question of international law:

According to the laws and usages of nations, a State is not obliged to make compensation for damages done to its citizens by an enemy, or wantonly or unauthorized by its own troops.—American State Papers, Claims, 199.

Judge Kent, (1 Kent's Commentaries, page 59,) commenting upon the decision of the Supreme Court in Brown vs. United States, says:

The broad principle was assumed that war gave to the sovereign the full right to take the persons and confiscate the property of the enemy whenever found.

Halleck, in his International Law, (page 447,) states it thus:

It will hereafter be shown that a firm possession is sufficient to establish the captor's title to personal or movable property captured on land.

Whiting (War Powers, pages 48, 52) expresses himself in these words:

Capture passes title.

Nothing in the Constitution interferes with the right of confiscation of enemy's property.

Whatever of their rights of property are lost in and by wars are lost forever.

The Army regulations, enacted by Congress, provide:

All property lawfully taken from the enemy or from the inhabitants of an enemy's country instantly becomes public property, and must be used and accounted for as such.

We have thus reached these conclusions: The rebellion was civil war. Civil wars are governed by the law of nations. The law of nations gives to the captor property captured from an enemy. Property lost in war is lost forever.

Having controverted, it seems to me successfully, the premises insisted upon, the conclusion reached that the fifth amendment to the Constitution gives to pardoned rebels the right to demand compensation for their private property captured and taken for public use in the effort of the Government to subdue them as rebels and to crush out their rebellion cannot be true.

COMPENSATION NOT REQUIRED TO BE MADE AN ENEMY.

The original Constitution did not provide for compensation under any circumstances for private property taken for public use. That was done by way of amendment, but that amendment applies to a condition of peace. The rights guaranteed by the Constitution are different in peace than in war. We have instanced the freedom of speech, of the press, of personal liberty, trial by jury, and due process of law. That the fifth amendment is intended to confer a civil right, a peace power, see Halleck's International Law, page 124.

The supreme court of Georgia, (9 Georgia, 341,) in the case before referred to, wherein reference was made to the use by General Jackson of cotton bales, used these words:

It is not doubted but that there are cases in which private property may be taken for public use without the consent of the owner, and without compensation, and without any provision of law for making compensation.

I have been stating the general principles governing in a state of war. I do not controvert the position that a government through its legislature may modify these provisions, and that such modification would be binding upon its army. The Government by law could restore the proceeds of captured and abandoned property if it should so enact. Nor do I deny that conditions can be annexed to the offer of pardon. It has, however, been held (4 Wall., 381) that a pardon does not restore property or interests vested in others.

THE EFFECT OF THE PRESIDENT'S PARDON.

The pardon and general amnesty offered by President Johnson on Christmas, 1865, was not an unconditional one; it contained this important exception:

Except also as to any property of which any persons may have been legally divested under the laws of the United States.

It has been shown that the laws of nations are the laws of the United States during a state of war, and are recognized so to be by the Constitution itself; that capture legally divests title; it follows, therefore, that the assertion that the fifth amendment restores the right to demand compensation for private property taken by the public falls to the ground, if not for the reasons heretofore given, then for the further reason that in this respect it is expressly excepted by the pardon itself.

Sir, it is not an uncontroverted question that the law of nations gives even to a loyal citizen the right to demand compensation for property destroyed by his country's army, to say nothing of that destroyed by an enemy.

Whiting, in his War Powers, page 59, uses these words:

As a matter of expediency Congress may direct that no property of loyal citizens residing in disloyal States should be seized by military force, without compensation. This is an act of grace, which, though not required by the laws of war, may well be granted.

Alexander Hamilton, as already quoted, made this declaration:

According to the laws and usages of nations, a state is not obliged to make compensation for damages done to its citizens by an enemy.

It has been said again, (4 Court of Claims, 547:)

No Government, but for special favor, has ever paid for property of its own citizens, destroyed in its own country, on attacking or defending itself against a common public enemy.

MORE THAN THE COUNTRY WILL STAND.

This new demand upon the Treasury is more than the country ought to or will stand. Much has been forgiven. Upon this floor are now admitted those who a few short years ago constituted a part of the executive department, the cabinet, the legislative department of a government which sought to divide this fair land of ours, now participating in its destiny and making its laws. Is that not enough? Are we yet to pay the men who slew our sons, wasted our substance, depleted our Treasury, laid upon us a heavy taxation—are we yet to pay them, I say, for what they lost in bringing all this and more upon our people?

DANGEROUS TO REST THEM EVEN ON PROOF OF LOYALTY.

It is time to make haste slowly. Statutes of limitations should not be extended, jurisdictions should not be enlarged, the bars that are put up to shield the National Treasury should not be let down. Even the law which grants relief to loyal citizens is being made a step-stone for the payment of rebel claims. The commissioners of claims, in their first annual report, in 1871, truly said:

It is easier and more profitable to be loyal now than it was during the war, and much of the proof or disloyalty has perished or been forgotten in the lapse of time.

And again in 1872:

We find by experience that to form a correct opinion as to whether a claimant was or was not loyal during the war, we cannot safely rely upon the mere opinions of witnesses as to his loyalty and upon statements at this late day of conversations.

Mr. Delano, chairman of the Committee of Claims in this House in 1866, speaking of the ease with which loyalty can be proven and the danger of ex parte affidavits, said:

These and like considerations have brought the committee to the conclusion—that that conclusion was unanimous—that an effort to discriminate between the loyal and the disloyal would be an impracticability, and that the result of it would be to bring this House to the payment of all this class of claims.

FRAUDULENT CLAIMS NEARLY PROVEN.

In corroboration of the statement of the danger that the claims of those who were disloyal may be paid under pretense of loyalty, and the utter unreliability of the evidence in many cases offered, let me recount the history and evidence of three, not exceptional, cases before the southern claims commission as given to me by a member of that commission.

And first, of a citizen of New Orleans, a lady, who claimed as heir to a deceased father over half a million dollars for stores and supplies taken from him, a loyal man, by the Army. These allegations were sworn to by several witnesses before the commission, and a petition was presented to it, signed by over fifty Senators and Representatives, urging that the claimant was meritorious and that relief be granted her speedily. A special agent was dispatched to investigate the case on the spot. It was then proven beyond all question, beyond all doubt, that the father and daughter were bitterly disloyal; that he had been before the war, and during it, and at death a bankrupt, having had neither stores nor supplies for an army to seize.

Another claimant was a citizen of North Carolina, a dealer in ship-stores. He claimed over $50,000 because of property seized. He testified to his loyalty during the war and produced a number of witnesses who also swore to it. The commissioners, with a wise prudence, thought it best to look over the rebel archives to ascertain if they would throw any light upon the claimant. Several letters signed with his name were found. He was recalled and the signatures (only) shown him and he testified they were his. One was a letter to Governor Letcher, of Virginia, complaining that the overseer on his brother's plantation was a Union man and had raised the Union flag. Another to the confederate government offered for a sum stated to purchase and fit out a vessel and command it as a blockade-runner. Still another, addressed to the same government, asked that his brother's plantation (Monticello) be given to him because of his loyalty to the confederacy and his brother's disloyalty, he being a commodore in the United States Navy.

In the third case, now pending, the claimant is the guardian for minor heirs. As the parents died shortly before the civil war, the question of loyalty did not enter. The claim was for something over $125,000, and for Army stores and supplies said to have been taken by the Union Army from the plantation of his wards. He established the loss apparently beyond question by eight witnesses and that it was caused by the United States Army. A special agent was sent there to examine into the facts, and it was shown that a rebel command had passed over the plantation, that the guardian was himself an officer in the command, and that it had driven off the horses and cattle, burned the barns and cribs with their contents.

EVERY SAFEGUARD NEEDED.

Is it any wonder that Mr. Lawrence and his committee should doubt the expediency of granting relief, even in case of claimed loyalty? Has not the time come when it would be well to close our courts and committee-rooms to this class of cases?

But the probabilities are small that the doors will be closed; there is danger, if we may judge from the earnestness with which they are pressed, that the doors will be opened still wider; that those dropped from pension-rolls because of disloyalty will be restored; that mail contractors will be paid for service in States after they had declared their secession; that longer time will be granted in which to file claims; that the farce of proving loyalty will not even be required; that cotton taxes and tobacco taxes will be refunded; that the proceeds of captured and abandoned cotton will be distributed; that the doctrine will be established that compensation for all losses during the war shall be made.

And now, Mr. Speaker, allow me in conclusion to express the opinion to the people of our country that if they would guard the Treasury against this whirlwind of claims and schemes upon it, if they would not see the tax-payers of the country still further burdened to make good, so far as money can make it, the losses of the South, caused by its attempt to take the nation's life; if they would not see disloyalty honored as loyalty is honored; if they would not lose all that was gained by the triumph of the Union arms, in view of the certain change of the political complexion of the Senate in the next Congress, then make sure that the next House of Representatives is placed within the control of that party which sustained, maintained, and saved our glorious Republic.

I yield the remainder of my hour to the gentleman from Minnesota.

TRANSFER OF INDIAN BUREAU.

Mr. STEWART. Mr. Speaker, I assume that it is or necessarily will be the fixed purpose of the Government to require of the Indians inhabiting this country that they shall permanently locate upon limited tracts of land and that as soon as possible they shall undertake to support themselves by agriculture and the other industries which develop from cultivation of the soil. Therefore, being ignorant and unpracticed, they must be taught, not only how to labor but how to live by labor, and this involves the introduction among them of the methods, habits, ideas, and laws by which industry is stimulated and its results are economized in civilized communities. That is, these Indians must be civilized, and being civilized there will be no longer an excuse for holding them as either aliens or wards. The end of the Indian policy of the Government is the admission of Indians to equal citizenship. That ultimate conclusion, it seems to me, should be kept in view in all our dealings with the Indians.

But our Indian system, in important respects, is older than our Indian policy. It had its origin with the trading companies and was developed by the Army. Hence it has been an incongruous combination of the conciliatory practices of the traders with the arbitrary rule of the military; and though it is now undergoing change, it is yet far from being reformed or well adapted to the policy which is being inaugurated under it. Unfortunately, also, it rests upon a constitutional provision and laws which applied to a condition of things which is passing away and upon judicial decisions which were dictated by the expediency of a past time. Otherwise we might consider the expediency of subjecting the Indians by distribution among the whites and free association with them to those irresistible influences by which our civilization in every decade conquers an aggregate of ignorance, unthrift, and viciousness equal probably to all the savagery of all our Indian population; or we might consider the expediency of providing for the Indians through the agency of the several States and Territories in which they are located. Yet, though a radical change of the system cannot be made except by gradual progress through long time, it is on all sides asserted that reformation is necessary.

Men who are interested in the welfare of the Indians, especially those particularly interested in the always peaceful and submissive bands or tribes with whom the experiment of introducing civilized ways of self-support has been tried under the most favorable circumstances, complain that the results so far reached are not in proportion to the time and expenditure. Others, and the larger number, who regard the Indian question as a vexation, to be gotten rid of in the shortest, easiest way, while accusing the present Indian service of all the errors and crimes of the past as well as the present, propose not an improvement of the system, but to go back to the most faulty expedient which was resorted to during the time when we had no Indian policy except to serve the occasion and the time.

In pursuance of the policy of making the Indians a self-supporting, civilized people, ultimately to become citizens of the United States and participate in the government of States, it appears to me that the system of dealing with the Indians should be reformed or changed so that the most direct and economical way to the ultimate end may be pursued. Their isolation from the whites should be regarded as temporary, because high civilization cannot thus be attained. They should be located in communities of not more than a few thousand, on correspondingly small reservations, where white farmers and mechanics will be their near neighbors. The laws of the land should be extended over them and they should be enabled for that purpose, and to accustom themselves to our forms of government, to choose peace officers, serve on juries in courts to be held within their reservations when necessary, and, as they arrive at an understanding of the benefits of concerted action, with willingness to work or pay taxes for their common good, they should be enabled and encouraged to organize municipal governments.

The expediency, however, of arbitrarily setting aside their tribal forms is questionable. They would quickly and without friction be merged in our elective forms if we should seek to introduce them among the Indians. Existing treaties should be scrupulously carried out to the letter, and where possible final treaties be made providing for the full surrender of all claims of dependence on the one hand and on the other for full recompense for every past violation of treaties or usurpation of rights. (I am considering particularly the dealings with Indians who have not made war upon the whites and therefore cannot be claimed to have forfeited any right.) There should be a limit to the assistance promised or given any individual and any community. Extensive or expensive public improvements should not be undertaken with the public money. The Indians should be early taught to make their own roads and to unite for other common purposes. The plan of paying them for work for themselves should be abandoned or greatly modified. The man or family receiving largest permanent benefit from the common fund should understand that thereafter those who have received less or no assistance will have the greater claims on that fund. The rights of each individual to assistance should be clearly defined and limited by law or regulations having the force of law, and in this as in all respects possible where the rights of an Indian are concerned, little or nothing should be left to any one's discretion. Some one, say the governor of the State or Territory, or other persons not responsible to the Indian Bureau, ought to be the authorized agent or representative of the Indians before the Departments and Congress and its committees, and also in the courts until the courts can give to Indians the full rights of citizens. But the agents of the bureau with the Indians should not have their influence for good weakened by adding to the number who will appear to the Indians to be their superiors in authority. Rather the agent should appear to the Indians under his charge as next in authority to the head of the bureau, so only that they have personal rights and privileges and know them and are subject not to the agent's caprices, but to the law which he represents.

As to the peace policy, so called, religion and politics, church and state, should be as independent of each other in the government of the Indians as of the whites. If we cannot for ourselves consent to have one scheme of religion more favored than another by law or government, we cannot afford to train our future fellow-citizens to associate church and state. In short, since it seems necessary that for some years at least the Indians being civilized should be to some extent isolated, so that the most forceful side of our civilization cannot be impressed upon them, we should improve their isolation by always impressing upon them the best side of civilization—its orderly methods, its security of person and property, its teachings of self-reliant industry and economy, the advantages of accumulated earnings, the good in education and social intercourse, and through the free co-operation of Christian churches, the comfort of religion.

But whether the system of operations be good or bad, much depends upon the agents, for it is not presumable that any system could be adopted which will dispense with the resident agent of the Government. This officer, in the communities forming upon the different reservations, is the exemplar of our civilization. The man thoroughly fit for the place will possess natural ability, be capable of conducting large business affairs or attending to their details; be generally familiar with the common industries, so that he can assist in them by advice, and he should be himself an industrious man. He should be a kind and patient man, a believer in human nature, without distinction as to the color of the skin, and he should be interested in his duties and in the Indian people. Withal, he should be diplomatic enough to be capable of winning and holding the confidence and influencing the minds of a people capricious and jealous as other ignorant people are. An approximation to such thorough fitness is only to be had by selection. The rule of the Army—to which it is proposed to transfer the Indian service—is routine detail, precluding selection.

While there are undoubtedly in the Army a number of officers of experience, education, and mental bent unitedly qualifying them for wisely working at great civil problems, yet these are not the men to whom Indian agencies would be assigned. Long service has entitled them to high rank and important commands. If they could be spared from Army service to take the places of civilians as agents, their large pay would be chargeable to the Indian service, where such expenses are not necessary. But the special and life-long education of the Army officer is not in the direction to qualify him for civil service. It is certainly not calculated to develop those qualities most essential for the Indian agent. He is trained to the rule of force. The agent has to train a people to self-government founded upon common interest and common consent. His profession is war. The agent has to lead a people too ready for war into the paths of peace. His presence merely would keep alive the savage idea that war is man's noblest occupation. It is the agent's duty to exalt the common occupations of mankind. His habits, according to the customs of the Army service, would not recommend work. It is the agent's duty to set an example of every-day work.

The Army officer would call soldiers to his assistance. Not to speak of the offense which placing them in charge of the Army would give to those Indians who have remained peaceable through many provocations, the bad effects of associating Indians and soldiers should be considered. More than is gained by the isolation of Indian bands from daily intercourse with settled communities of whites would be lost by quartering even a few soldiers among them. This objection can be shown to be a very serious one by reference to the present condition at Indian agencies where Army posts are maintained or by inquiry as to past experience.

But it is urged that the methods of accounting and contracting in the Army are perfect, and that the Quartermaster and Commissary Departments would economically supply the Indians. A criticism of Army methods as sharp and searching as the civil service is almost constantly exposed to, and which the Indian service has especially borne, would expose the fallacy of claims of superior excellence for the business forms of the Army. Army contractors and Indian contractors do not differ much; they thrive about alike. And, without disparagement of the good character of the body of officers of our Army, it may be remarked that the men who transact the business of the Army, who are mostly civilians or nominally attached to the Army, are as much indebted to the obscurity with which Army regulations and military observances surround their doings for the credit given their work as to any superiority of that work. In practice the Army is expensive. Enlist the six hundred able-bodied men on the White Earth and Red Lake reservations, Minnesota, as soldiers and they would cost the Government $600,000 a year. Through the last three years, with crops failing and game scarce, this six hundred with their women and children have been supported for about $50,000 a year. The Army, twenty-five thousand strong, costs $30,000,000 a year. The Indian Bureau, having one hundred and fifty thousand or more Indians to partially support, costs $7,000,000 a year. But the question of cost and economy is a subordinate one. It is a matter of detail which may be changed without affecting the main purpose.

The ruling question is whether we shall make the Indian service conform as exactly as possible to the wise and humane policy of civilizing the Indians or by committing them to the care of a non-civilizing agency abandon that policy and with it the friendship and gratitude due at least to the many thousands of red men who have never wronged or even resisted white men.

A separate department for the Indian service would be a most desirable measure of reform, because that would soonest bring about a thorough revision of the system. Next best doubtless would be the making the Indian Bureau independent under charge of a commission embracing the Secretaries of the Interior and War Departments. But without disturbing the bureau from its present position reform is possible and will come whenever Congress gives to the subject the investigation and consideration its importance entitles it to.

THE TARIFF—PROTECTION VS. FREE TRADE.

Mr. ELLSWORTH. Mr. Speaker, our country is trembling with fear to-day with reference to the threatened reduction of tariff rates. There is a general and wide-spread alarm all over the North, the East, and the West which amounts to almost a panic. It is absolutely unheard of in our history. There never has been anything like it upon the same subject, and the people cannot be quieted. They cannot be silenced. They want to know what it all means and where it is to end. They see only ruin and bankruptcy for those who have braved the financial storm thus far, and who by dint of great exertions and continued effort and a wise economy have kept their crafts afloat; and really it is not strange they are troubled, and waiting in painful suspense for the announcement of the result of the long deliberations of the members of the committee having in charge the tariff bill. All over the land men are anxious, and waiting breathlessly for the result; and why is it necessary for our people to be kept in this unpleasant, this disagreeable and unfortunate condition through long weary weeks and months of waiting and watching? I am confident, sir, no tariff bill reducing the tariff rates on articles of foreign nations which come into successful competition with home articles can be passed during this Congress, if ever; and if that be true, then why should we not relieve our people from this troublesome question and give them rest and quiet? Our business men certainly have had and will have quite enough to struggle through without any other and additional and unnecessary burdens for them to stagger and fall under. They need no more or weightier discouragements than they have now. Do not add any more. I beseech you do not help crush out the only hope of the survivors of financial wrecks scattered all over the country so painfully thick. It does seem as though an attempt at a revision of the tariff at this time could only result in injury to our people, and why is it attempted? Is there any great demand for it by any very considerable portion of our citizens? I do not think so. I am very sure they do not desire it. And why, I ask again, is an effort made here to revise it and reduce the tariff rates of the present time?

It is strange, indeed, that we can never have any permanency to our tariff in this country. It is strange that our people can never be allowed to know what they can depend upon for any considerable length of time. On this important matter, as often as about eight or ten years, it must be all overhauled and set adrift. What the country needs is permanency. Business men must know what they can depend upon for a series of years or they do not dare make large ventures in business; and the American policy has been, and is yet, to keep them constantly disquieted and uncertain as to the future; never knowing what the next day will bring forth; never knowing what will be the policy of the Government, and therefore never knowing what they can be reasonably sure of for a single year, and a man with a thimbleful of brains can see in a moment, if he will pause that length of time and contemplate the subject, that this is a very great hindrance to business; it in fact is a great paralyzer of business. This any man of observation and intercourse with business men knows full well. It is suicidal policy, and ought to be put away and a permanent policy adopted and lived to.

Why, sir, what is the matter with our people that our own national interests are not more carefully guarded and protected? Why can we not learn something from the other nations of the world? Why can we not see the success that has ever attended the nations who have been steady and constant in their protective policy? It only needs a brief survey of the field of the world to settle this very important question in favor of protection. The story is soon told, if we will but dispassionately and without partisan spirit look over the ground; and I therefore ask the attention of this House for a little time while I attempt to show to the House the vast importance of a thoroughly protective policy by our Government. I will deal as little as possible in dry statistics, but give in as few words as possible the history of protection and the result of free trade among the civilized nations of the earth, or the more important ones. It is a truth that no man in his sound mind will deny, that actual experience is worth more than all the speculations of all the theorists. In this you will readily admit I am correct. No man will venture to controvert it.

Our southern people are clamoring for free trade, and a large portion of them always have been. You would hardly think it modest in me to say you are laboring under the influence of a delusion; but such, I venture to assert, is the fact; and one single question will bring to your mind facts that will necessarily lead the mind to the truth of my proposition: why is the wealth of the land to-day in the New England States so largely? Can you answer that question? Why are the people there in that cold, rocky, comparatively barren country, rich, while the South is poor—comparatively poor, I mean?

Now comes the reasoning, the argument of the case; and the mind of the thinker naturally runs on to the conclusion; it cannot help it. The country is barren and hard and poor; the South is rich and fertile and beautiful. Where, then, is the reason? One is a frozen land, with six months of winter; the other is a flowery land, with almost constant summer. Why the cold, hard, wintry country rich, and the land of perpetual spring and summer time impoverished and States going into liquidation? The great war and the consequent desolation of the country South, and the carpet-bag rule so often mentioned, will not account for the very great difference.

There is but one answer to this question, and it becomes the people of this country, North and South, to find what that answer is. The whole secret of the difference is in this fact: that the labor of the North, and especially the New England States, is greatly diversified; in the South it is not. The consequence has been in the North a great home market has been established, and the result of this home market is to build up and improve the country, to fertilize and enrich the lands. The building up of the great manufacturing establishments in the New England States has produced a home market for the farmer, for the lumberman, for the miner, for the mechanic, and for all the trades and occupations the world has to be supplied.

While the North have been giving their energies to adding to the many demands of the people for employment and so diversifying their calls for labor and skill in a thousand ways, thereby making it possible for the man with one hand and with no eyesight to work and earn handsome wages so as to be able to comfortably care for his family of little ones, the great South has given her attention alone to agriculture, which requires men of good strong limbs and constitutions and leaves all the old men and crippled men and children of no use comparatively. Am I right?

Why is it to-day that there are so many, many thousands of acres of once fertile and productive lands in the South thrown out to commons, all worn out and desolate, where not even a mullein stalk stands to testify to the strength of the soil? I have seen some of it and know how it looks. Why is this? It is simply and only for the reason that the fruits of the soil are continually moved away from the lands and never come back in any shape whatever. It is a constant drain upon the lands; and this process will make a desert of the richest country in the world if continued for a sufficient length of time. Cotton, the great staple of the South, is a great exhauster of lands, more so than almost any other vegetable grown in this country. Rice is not so bad by far. Sugar-cane is bad enough; but the great staple is cotton, and it is raised only to send to foreign markets, thus constantly impoverishing the soil where it is cultivated, and thus the cotton-grower must constantly look for new fields. He cannot remain by the century on the same lands and raise cotton in paying quantities and paying qualities. The market is a distant one, largely a transatlantic one, subject to all the delays, the hinderances, and the fluctuations of a distant market.

Suppose this whole matter was reversed. Suppose the South should encourage and build up a home market by building up and establishing manufactures. What would be the result? The labor of the South would be diversified. Then soon a large part of the South would be cultivated for other purposes than the raising of cotton and sugar-cane. All classes of people would find employment. A home market for all the productions of the country would be built up and then the South would demand protection from the wealth and influence of the Old World until we could successfully compete with the accumulated wealth of old England and France and Germany. You see New England is just what her enterprise and diversity of labor has made her. The reason why she is able to loan money to-day is because she has not confined her people to the raising of corn, rye, and cattle, and now her hills blossom with beauty and her towns and villages decorate her valleys everywhere, and a more independent and cultured people do not live upon the face of the earth. Hardy old New England has placed this country under everlasting obligations to her by the educated, intelligent, and highly cultivated men and women she has produced among her stony hills and sent out all over the land to lighten it with intelligence and culture. You will find her sons and her daughters everywhere and always at work; they are never idle; they are moving the world on and will not let it stand still.

HISTORY OF THE TARIFF.

The American colonies were held under restraint so absolute that beyond the common industries and the most ordinary mechanical employments no kind of manufactures were permitted by the mother country; not even a hatter-shop was allowed to transact business. In 1750 a hatter-shop in Massachusetts was declared a nuisance by the British government, and the poor hatter was closed out and not even permitted to vend the hats he then had on hand and already made at his own expense, and for which he had paid his own money.

In the same year an act was passed permitting the importation of pig-iron from the colonies. And why? Think of the reason; because charcoal, then exclusively employed in smelting the ore, was nearly exhausted in England. That was the reason the old country allowed to the child the poor boon of manufacturing and importing into England pig-iron; but they forbade the erection of tilt-hammers, slitting or rolling mills, or any establishments for the manufacture of steel. In the same year the great Earl of Chatham, alarmed and troubled at the enterprise of the western colonies, declared that "they ought not to be allowed to manufacture so much as a hob-nail."

This was the kind of protection Great Britain threw around her people in that day; but compelled the colonies to open their ports freely to her, and so we had in that early day a taste of free trade that ought to satisfy us for all time.

And the navigation laws of England were in the same direction, and made so as to hold the colonies in utter subjection to the mother country. We were restrained in every possible way from diversifying our industries, and that policy toward us was the constant subjection of our industries to the rich manufacturing houses of Great Britain. And now we are being persuaded to voluntarily place upon the free limbs of the young Republic the same old fetters the tyranny from over the sea bound us with in our younger and more helpless days.

It so happened in the affairs of the world that this vassalage was destroyed, but not without a fearful and bloody war of years' duration; but that seven years of suffering and of agony threw off the shackles that had enslaved our industries and throttled our manufactures and gave freedom and life to our enterprise as a people, and gives us a lesson on the question of protection that is worthy of consideration.

A protective period followed. The commerce with England was necessarily broken off during the war, and the people were left free, of course, to supply their own necessities by their own skill and industry, untrammelled by the prohibitive laws of the mother country.

And what was the result of this freedom? How had the seven years of war affected our industries? It was found at the close of the war of the Revolution that we had advanced rapidly in the skilled industries that add rapidly to the wealth of a people and that enable nations to be independent and self-supporting, and the success that had then been attained in that direction encouraged Alexander Hamilton, and in 1791 he argued the practicability and the duty of encouraging our manufactures; and enumerated seventeen grand departments which were then well established, and they prevailed as well in the Southern as in the Middle and Northern States. You see the war gave us protection, the most perfect protection possible, and the country was rapidly recovering from the effect of the war thereby. Mr. Hamilton reported at that time that the manufacturing of household goods and furniture was very large, amply sufficient for the home wants of the people, and already affording textile fabrics for sale to foreign countries.

Now, what was the result when this protection was removed? Did our industries still continue to prosper? Let the facts answer.

Soon after the peace of Paris, 1783, all household industries and enterprises were effectually suppressed. And how? By an inundation of foreign goods. Our manufactures were crippled, and in a little time bankrupted and utterly destroyed by the flood of goods that poured in like a swelling river from the Old World, and our manufactures were thus ruined. In the first Federal Congress, a member, speaking of this period of free trade, said: "We bought, according to the doctrine of modern theorists, where we could purchase cheapest, and were soon drowned in a sea of foreign commodities." English goods were sold at lower rates in our maritime cities than in Liverpool or London.

And how did this destruction of our manufacturing establishments affect the agricultural interests of the country? Were the farmers and the consumers in any way benefited, by this fall of industrial houses? By no means, and here is where the people are deceived. When the manufacturing interests of any country are prosperous and in a way of adding to their wealth, then labor is lifted and feels the prosperity, and the farmer has a market for his produce. And why? Simply for the reason there is somebody able to buy and pay for his goods. So, thus early in our history, 1783, when we were without protection, and the foreigner flooded our markets, a general depreciation of real estate followed, and failures became the order of the day among landed proprietors.

Dr. Hugh Williamson, describing the distresses and disorders of the year 1786, says:

The scarcity of money is so great and the difficulty of paying debts has been so common that riots and combinations have been formed in many places, and the operations of civil government have been suspended.

Chief-Justice Marshall, in his life of Washington, speaking of this crisis generally, and particularly of the causes which led to Shay's rebellion, says:

On opening their ports an immense quantity of foreign goods was introduced into this country, and they were tempted by the sudden cheapness of imported goods, and by their own wants, to purchase beyond their capacity for payment.

And what was the inevitable result? What the certain consequences of this course? As soon as the policy had time to develop itself fully it brought its harvest of woes, and so he says further:

The bonds of men, whose competency to pay their debts was unquestionable, could not be negotiated but at a discount of 30, 40, and 50 per cent.; real property was scarcely vendible, and sales of any article for ready money could only be made at a ruinous loss.

And the distress was so great and so wide-spread that a disposition manifested itself everywhere to resist the laws. Such was the result of free trade in the early history of this country, and such will be the history again if this theory is adopted. And the people soon saw and recognized the difficulties under which they were laboring, and protection against foreign manufactures became the prevailing sentiment of the day; the experience they had endured was a powerful and controlling influence.

In full sympathy with this sentiment, Washington wore a coat of domestic cloth on the day of his inauguration.

The first act protecting our home industries was passed July 4, 1789, and was followed by another the 10th of August, 1790, largely increasing the duties imposed by the first. And now the result of this first protection is all-important as a lesson to guide us yet down here in the year 1878. Why not? If the theory is right it will prove itself so, and if wrong it will do the same at all times. It lifted the cloud from the country in a single year. Only one short year and the cry of distress is silenced and the people are prosperous. It seems strange, but such is history.

Listen to the words of Washington, and I trust he is good authority everywhere in this land. In October, 1791, writing to La Luzerne, he held this language:

In my tour I confirmed by observation the accounts which we had all along received of the happy effects of the General Government upon our agriculture, commerce, and industry. The same effects prevail in the Middle and Eastern States, with the additions of vast progress in the most useful manufactures.

But the tariff of 1816 was quite too low. We had been aided up to this time by foreign wars, which, taken in connection with our tariff rates, until this time had afforded us nearly adequate protection; but now comes a time when there was comparative peace in Europe. The battle of Waterloo has been fought and the great disturber of the nations and the destroyer of thrones is confined on his lone, barren isle, and a general pacification has occurred between the leading nations of Europe, and England, France, and Germany went to work to regain their lost trade of the world and soon found a way into our markets, and the tariff of 1816, unsupported by the wars abroad, was wholly inadequate. Our prosperity, which had been so wonderful; our skies, that had been so suddenly cleared from all clouds and mists, were to be darkened again, and our prosperity went down under a flood of foreign importations, and from 1819 to 1824 the country presented another picture of distress that was absolutely appalling, and there were no shadings of light; it was quite as dark as before the light of prosperity had dawned upon us, and this distress came to us in a time of profound peace.

A few years, seven years of peace, with the country's labor undeffended, inflicted a hundred-fold more injury upon the people of the country than any such period of war had or could do. But this time of calamity was not without its value to the people. It was of use in the end. It brought them to see and know the cause of their distress. It was a lesson easily read and understood, and no sooner did the distress come than the people were brought to reflect, and they no sooner reflected than they saw the mischief and the folly of free trade, and then went directly to work to remedy the difficulty and bring the blessings of protection once more to the people. And a democratic Congress ordered the republication of Hamilton's report of 1791, on manufactures, and the tariff of 1824 was passed, and not being sufficiently protective this act was amended in 1828 and the nation again sprang from its couch of despair. The night of distress was again exchanged for a glad morning of sunshine, and once more the people rejoiced and were made glad, and the clouds drifted away from our financial sky. The whole national debt had been suddenly reduced, and the people came all too suddenly into general prosperity, and they soon forgot the lessons of the day, and they came to think the accumulations in the national Treasury would soon become unmanageable, unless they took measures to prevent its overflow. The nation became mad and wild again. How strange it seems when we stop and ponder upon it. Only a few short years since we were burdened with debt, and property of all kinds worthless comparatively in market, and real estate a drug and a hindrance to any man; want everywhere, and riots threatened on every hand; debtors utterly unable to pay, and bankruptcy universal. And now because the storm of desolation has passed away and the sun of prosperity has been shining in beauty for a few short years, the cry comes up once more: return to the blessings of free trade. We are too rich, too prosperous. Our wealth and plenty, our comfort and luxury will swamp us. South Carolina went into nullification. Virginia sanctioned the doctrine; Alabama and Georgia stood with them. And so to appease these discontented people, and I think mistaken people, a compromise was agreed upon, and we set sail again upon the free-trade craft, and on a pleasant and peaceful sea. And under the act of 1833, that abandoned the protection of domestic labor, the imports in the first three years of its operations averaged one hundred and twenty-two millions, against an average of seventy millions for the last five years under the act of 1828.

What followed? What was the result? How were the people brought to their senses again? Seven years of unprotected American industry, stretching from 1833 to 1840, brought the same old story of ruin to our manufacturers and consequent want of employment for the people. Property again depreciated. The country was once more flooded with the work of foreign hands, and the cry of distress was everywhere. Once more the people were brought to reflection and the party in power was swept from office by an indignant people, and free trade was replaced by a protective tariff passed in the year 1842, which was the best protective tariff this country has ever been blessed with. In so short a time that it seems almost beyond belief that protection relieved the country from all its woes, and floated it out on to a prosperous sea once more, and the people rejoiced again. It really would seem as though they would never forget the repeated teachings of the past. In four brief years all was bright and prosperous, no distress among the people, no want, no suffering, no hunger, the national Treasury in healthful condition, and no discontent anywhere except in the cotton States. There was some uneasiness, and because of their want of diversity of labor, and in 1846, to please the South, the tariff of 1842, under which we had again emerged from our national troubles was modified by substituting largely ad valorem for specific duties, the worst of all tariff rates, for the reason it opens the door to innumerable frauds; and still under this tariff, bad as it was, the nation prospered, and with the aid of the discovery of gold in California, and the Crimean war, we went on successfully and well, and a full Treasury and general prosperity for a better time led the people to forget the dreary past and the bitter lessons of the years gone by, and in 1857 a reduction of 25 per cent. was made in our tariff rates, and this reduction was followed by another inundation of our country with foreign commodities, and with another suspension of specie payments.

The imports for consumption now went up $11.82 per head of the population in place of $5.42, more than double the average, and the banks issued an immense amount of bills, and loans increased rapidly, rising from three hundred and twelve to six hundred and thirty-four millions.

The public debt also rose in a very short time to almost double its former amount, and in a very short time to four times its former amount. And it is true, almost a certainty, that the panic of 1857 in 1860 or 1861 would have been followed by a general explosion if the great war of the rebellion had not displaced it, and it would have been the result of free trade, pure and simple.

The war, among the blessings it brought us, to say nothing of the woes, gave us the Morrill tariff, which was nearly as good for protection as the tariff of 1828. And this tariff carried us through the death-struggle with slavery and brought us out all safe and sound and richer than when the first gun was fired on Sumter. And the time had come in 1872 when the same old folly must be attempted again, and the tariff that had so faithfully served us and aided us in the time of our great trial must be reduced; and down it went 10 per cent. And then the panic came, the same old story; and now once more wise heads are in secret hatching out another brood of woes for the people, never heeding the lessons of the past. Learning nothing by all the sad experience, of the free trade experience of the fading years, they are now sitting in secret places incubating a list of calamities that will, if fathered by the Forty-fifth Congress, bring us yet again the same sorrowful harvest as the past has done.

I add, that the average of the pauper population at every series of years under free trade in our country has been much larger than during the same time under protection, and that all the almshouses in the country come to our aid in proof of this statement. I ask any man of judgment or brains to look at this history, this true history, all recorded on the pages of our country's annals, and tell me what it proves. There is but one answer, there can be but one; and protection must be the rule for us until we are possessed of more wealth than the old nations of the world. How can we expect to successfully compete in the great industries with nations who have twice our wealth? It cannot be unless we are protected from their competition. Our fathers knew something. Washington knew something, and he fully understood the wise policy, so wore the coat of homespun cloth to teach by his example. But the free-traders tell us tariff for protection is all well for the rich trader and the rich manufacturer but it is death to the poor man and the farmer, the consumer. This is the height of folly. The poor man is never so well dressed and fed, nor his family, as when the manufacturer is prospering, and thereby able to give him employment at good, fair wages. What use is free trade to the poor man now when he has no money with which to buy? Ten years ago he could have bought a coat at $20 but now he cannot buy one at three. Why not? For the simple reason that the manufacturer cannot afford to employ him at any price. In 1868 the poor man could get his $2 per day, now nothing, and the result is he cannot buy.

But who is clamoring for free trade? Who in this country desires it? The cotton States; they want it still, and the democratic party in Congress, to please them, are inclined to try the ruinous experiment again which has proved so disastrous to us so many, many times. Great Britain would like to have us indulge in this supreme national folly again, too. And why does she? Why did she not give us some of its blessings when we were feeble and needy colonies of hers? Answer that, my friends, if you can. Why did she close up the poor hatter down in old Massachusetts? If free trade is so good a thing, and so just, why did she not let the colonies enjoy it? These are hard questions to answer; hard for the free trader, but for no one else.

HISTORY OF THE TARIFF WITH OTHER NATIONS.

No nation has ever risen to be a power in the world, a power of any considerable consequence, that has not had some adequate system of national protection for its home industries. The history of all nations proves this position to be a verity. England is one of the best examples we can take, and so we turn to her record on this subject.

England is a free trader now, so she claims, and yet she is not pure and simple. England desires free commerce with the world. Why does she? Because she claims to be the workshop of the world. Because she claims, and not without reason, to be the mistress of the seas, and can float her wares and her commodities everywhere without help from any nation or people. These are the reasons among others. But how came she to be the great work-house for the world? How came her mercantile marine to excel all others?

Let us look at her history and see. England occupies but a very small place on the map of Europe. It can be covered with a twenty-five-cent piece. And yet she stands to-day the foremost nation, commercially and industrially, in the world. But she did not gain this important place without a struggle, and a hard one. She has raised her commerce from the very lowest to the very highest position among the nations of Europe and of the globe. She never could have done this great work in an even-handed struggle with the peoples surrounding her. Any such attempt would have been a hopeless one, and her statesmen were wise enough to comprehend the folly of such an undertaking. She is to-day reaping the benefits of a bold, wise, and selfish policy. Many of the nations around her were far in advance of her when she entered upon her career, and the odds against her seemed almost too great to admit of the hope of overcoming.

And in face of these discouragements what did England do? Did she sit down and allow the peoples around to flood her little island with the handiwork of their people, and leave her own to starve for the want of work? Not by any means. She set herself to work to give employment to her poor. Did she entertain any free-trade follies? Did she listen to the dreaming schoolmen of her day? By no manner of means. Not a bit of it. She went to work manfully and well to protect her people from the richer nations by which she was surrounded, and even from the enterprise of competition of all, whether rich or poor.

She prohibited absolutely all competing imports, and prohibited her people from sending abroad the raw materials, and devised a system of bounties upon production and upon the exportation of manufactured goods, and extended active and generous aid to the immigration of artisans from the continent, and prohibited the emigration of her own skilled workmen; and prohibited the sending abroad of machinery which would in any possible way assist her rivals in competing with her for the trade of the world. She even made wars upon weaker peoples for the sole purpose of extending the field of her commerce and of controlling and supplying foreign and distant markets.

From 1731 way down to 1834 her woolen manufactures were steadily protected, beginning with fines, maimings, imprisonment, and death as the penalties for exporting native wool or importing foreign cloth, and maintaining these penalties for more than four hundred years, four times the life of this Republic.

Her tariff rates upon iron were absolutely prohibitive until 1834, and then only reduced to $5 per ton.

How different has been our policy, and how far behind her in point of wisdom. England is not a cotton-growing country. She grows not a pound, and yet in 1860 the real value of her exports of cotton amounted to £52,000,000 sterling, while those of iron, steel, wool, machinery, and silk amounted to more than forty-one millions.

Nature did nothing for England compared with our own country; but by her steady protection of her people she comes now across the ocean and bears our cotton on her own steamers home with her, thus giving employment to thousands upon thousands of her people on the seas; works up the cotton thus obtained, thereby giving employment to hundreds of thousands of her people, while our own are suffering for the wages thus earned by the British laborers; then reship the same cotton, only changed to textile fabrics, and supplies our markets, thus meeting the risks of nine thousand miles of ocean travel and transportation, and still competes with us successfully for our trade in such goods. Strike off all protection and then look for the result. What will it be? The cheap labor of England and the vastly larger wealth of that old country will again flood our markets and cripple our industries, and send hundreds of thousands more of our people to the ranks of the unemployed.

What has been the policy of England? Never to leave any interest of her people unprotected until they were fully able to more than compete with any other nation. She has ever given to her subjects the most perfect and adequate protection anywhere to be found in history.

THE LITTLE KINGDOM OF BELGIUM.

Here is another illustration of the wonderful benefits to a people in the struggle for national life found in ample and steady protection.

My whole argument might be safely left resting upon the facts of the industrial and commercial history of this kingdom, not one quarter as large in territory as the State of New York, and she has in this small compass a population of about five millions. She has succeeded by a constant and adequate protective policy in maintaining her place among the nations, and has grown from a mere handful of people to be a rich and powerful kingdom. She secures a home market by defending herself against all competition. She fosters and encourages her skilled industries by barring out all rivals, and her people are consequently alive with industry, and are carrying away the iron trade of northern and eastern Europe from England.

Her foreign commerce grew under protective policy, until, in 1860 it was nearly double that of our own country; and Belgium will soon be willing to enter the field of free trade with England.

Let us direct our attention to France, sunny France, beautiful France, and we shall here find lessons of wisdom to direct our steps upon this question. France has maintained from the earliest period in her national life the most absolute protective policy of any nation, with possibly England excepted; and she holds steadily to it yet. It has carried her through all her revolutions and national wars, and brought her out on her feet. Every time she has found her protective policy her safety and savior.

France went so far as to pay a large royalty to every loom put in operation, and continued that bounty for many years in her early history; and the result is that she has largely the trade of the polite nations of the world to-day for her fine laces and delicate fabrics; and will anybody say her aid thus extended was not in the way of national economy?

Russia has also, like France, taken care of her labor interests against all competition; and has by this means risen from barbarism, liberated her twenty millions of serfs, and advanced to be one of the principal powers in the world; and to-day free-trade Turkey is prostrate at her feet, and the army of the Czar is marching on Constantinople.

Why the difference? Why is Turkey, the sick man of the Orient, at the feet of France now?

Let history, the great teacher, reply. England induced her to indulge in the supreme folly of free trade. She was prosperous and happy. Her towns were alive with industry; her looms were clicking all over the empire; and the red fabrics of the Turks were sent all over the world. Only a few years since, and they were in every American market, and found on the shelves of almost every store. But the Turk was beguiled into this great foolishness of competing with England in the markets of the world and in her own. And now the Turkish looms are still. The old manufacturing cities are silent and poverty is the result everywhere. And it was the same before the Czar sent his legions there. Of 2,000 weaving establishments in the city of Towmovo in 1812 there were only 200 in 1831. And the sick man was made sick by free trade, more than by anything else. Ireland has been utterly crushed out by the free trade forced upon her by Great Britain. The beautiful fabrics of the Emerald Isle, the gem of the ocean, were once sent all over the world where civilization had a home. The Irish linens and cottons went everywhere. And now look at the fearful result. In 1800 there were in Dublin alone 5,000 hands employed in woolen manufactures, in 1840 only 602. In the manufacture of carpets, 700 hands at work in Dublin in 1800, in 1840 none. And the like calamity had in the same time fallen upon the cotton-spinners, the calico-weavers, and the silk-weavers. And Ireland is a desolation to-day as the result of free trade with England, forced on her by that people. And not being able to force it on the stubborn and willful Yankee they would wheedle Uncle Samuel into the great mistake that has utterly destroyed the Irish and so sickened the Turk that he stands limp and dumb before his conqueror.

And the poor Hibernian has had to flee from his green isle, made desolate and dreary by the free-trade policy of England. And they have been pouring into our country for years in one steady stream like a mighty river, and thus Ireland is being depopulated and going back into the dark past, the home of the wild beast.

India presents another striking example of the happy effects of free trade. In 1813 the commerce of India was thrown open to the world and competition invited. At the end of only twenty years the men, women, and children had been driven from the workshops to the fields of agriculture, and all demand for labor was at an end except in tilling the soil. And many of the most fertile lands in India, under free-trade rule, have been exhausted, worn out utterly, and are now abandoned and have gone back to furnish homes for the wild beasts of the jungle. The industries of the people have been utterly destroyed and blotted out, and the Englishman supplies the Indian and bears away with him to his little island home the silver and the gold from India. And India is England's vassal, and bows in mournful submission to her Empress Victoria, the Queen of the Isles.

We turn back to Portugal, and what do we behold there to give us light on this vexed subject? Portugal, hardly remembered now as one of the nations, in 1703 was one of the leading commercial states of Europe; and that year—fatal year in the history of Portugal—she concluded a treaty with England by which she bound herself to admit English wares into her ports at 15 per cent. duty for the favor of an English tax upon her wines one-third less than that imposed upon the wines of France.

Mark the sad result to Portugal. Formerly Lisbon had about four hundred ships, of from five to six hundred tons burden, employed in the trade with South America, but now that trade is utterly ruined. And only now and then a straggling ship is seen in waters of South America, with the flag of Portugal flying at its head, and her produce sent to foreign countries is almost wholly carried in foreign bottoms. And Turkey and Portugal are worn out and ruined by their competition, even-handed with England. And yet we find intelligent American citizens, in the face of all this truthful history and these plainly written lessons, clamoring for free trade, clamoring for the subjugation of our great industries to the wealth and cheap labor of England. Shall we do this for England, our enemy? She let loose her piratical ships when we were busy with a great calamity at home, and aided materially in sweeping our commerce from the markets of the world and our mercantile marine from the seas; and shall we recompense her for her friendly attentions at such a time by opening our ports for her to come and overwhelm our young industries, young and poor, too, compared with her own? Shall we do this silly thing? You know better, with all of this history of our own and other nations before you. You know it will be death to us. Death, sure and certain. England has twice our wealth, and she can flood us again, as she has done before, if we open the doors. We must not do it, if we care for our interests. If our welfare is of paramount importance to us to that of England, we will not again be lured by the friends of Great Britain into swinging wide open the doors of our country to the introduction of British wares at the expense of our own industries and our own people of all classes. We can only compete on equal grounds with England, in the manufacture of many kinds of commodities, by crushing our laboring population down to the level of the starving operatives of Manchester and Sheffield. Are we ready to do that in this country? I hope not. I trust not, sir.

Some will answer me by saying the true policy of all nations should be to give a free field to all; that it is a narrow and selfish rule that shuts out any from competition in the world's enterprises anywhere and everywhere, and that our people, in this land of free thought, free speech, and free action, should be free to buy where and when and of whom they please, untrammelled by any prohibitions or hindrances whatever. This sounds well, but there is a fatal fallacy in it. It will not, it never has resulted in the best good of any considerable class of our people.

The result has been to injure instead of benefit the consumer and the poor. It has and ever will result as follows: when the doors are thrown open the rich foreign manufacturers flood in their commodities and sell at small profit or no profit at all, if necessary, until they have crushed out competition and killed our industries. As soon as that is accomplished and the field is clear for them their prices rapidly rise until the people are forced to pay more for their goods than when they had the advantage of the competition that always springs up at home; and by the time this is done the laboring classes are out of employment and impoverished and must be supported largely by public charity. This has been the result in all the years before and will be in all the future. Why cannot all men see it? It is the simplest problem, to my mind, in the world.

It can be illustrated by the business of almost every town. Here is a man who has been in business for a long series of years. He has been successful; has grown rich. He can afford to squander for the present time a large sum of money in the sale of his goods if he can thereby strike out all competition and after that control the market. His neighbor is comparatively poor, but has opened business near him, and the man of wealth throws on the market for a year goods at a loss. What is the result? The man who dared to open business is soon ruined, his stock is gone, and he has no money with which to purchase any more, and his business is closed out. He is a bankrupt, and the old concern sends its prices up again and monopolizes the trade, and the working people afforded employment by this new man of business are all idle and out of employment, and soon they are unable to purchase at any price. Now, suppose the old concern had been prohibited from underselling and crushing out the new rival, then both would have stood equal and both would have lived; but such is not the law of trade.

Take another illustration, more apt: here is in one of our eastern cities an old manufacturing establishment worth millions. In an adjacent village springs up another of moderate means, but giving employment to a thousand men and making a market for the produce from a thousand farms near it. The wealthy concern in the adjacent town floods all the markets where our new concern has any hope of selling, at a loss or even at no profit whatever, for a sufficient length of time to swamp the new manufactory. And then what next? The old prices are resumed, and the thousand laborers are without work, and the thousand farms have no home market for their products, and suffering speedily finds its way to the homes of the idle men, and the farmers consume a large part of their profits as before in sending their goods to market. Now such is our case with Great Britain and France. They are in possession of double our wealth. They owe no foreign debt, and we owe largely beyond the ocean. The individual wealth of their great business men is such they can overwhelm us, and will be so for many years yet. But the time will come by and by when we can throw down the barriers and bid them enter and compete with us for the prize of success, but not yet. It is too soon, by far. We cannot do it now.

My constituents are largely engaged in the manufacture and sale of lumber and salt. There is no other so large a section of the Union, I think, represented by any one man on this floor, where can be found so much good pine lumber as in my district. There is vast wealth in our pineries, and our lumbermen are making lumber to-day at the merest possible living profit, and they can barely, by the dint of the utmost economy and industry, keep afloat with a tariff of $2 per thousand feet upon foreign lumber. Do you want to kill their business? Do you wish to ruin the hundreds of enterprising men who are struggling through this fearful panic, cutting out the pine lumber in the State of Michigan and other lumber States? Do you want to see them sink and disappear from the sea of enterprise, for the benefit, too, of our British rival lying alongside of us? Our business men now engaged in the lumber trade, if the tariff is taken off from lumber, will have to resort to one of three things: first, run over their pine lands and cut out the first-class timber, and leave the common timber for better times and better prices; or, second, cut down the pay of their laborers on a par with the Canucks of the Canadas, who live on pea-soup and potatoes and salt; or, third, continue their business under present wages, and soon be compelled to go into bankruptcy. They cannot, many of them, stop; they must go on. The absolute necessities of the poor people demand the prosecution of the business.

I beg of you, my friends, to take care of our people who are struggling along hoping for better and brighter times. Do not forsake them in this hour of their need. We want no reciprocity with the Canadas either. If they want to trade with us on an equality let them come into the American Union and share with us the blessings of a free government, and if they are not ready to do so let them stay out and stand or fall by their own merits. We can manage to live without them if they can without us.

Our salt interests in our State and other sections of the country are immense. Many millions of dollars are now actively employed in the business, and the competition in our own country is very intense indeed and so great as to reduce the price of salt to the lowest possible point at which it can be successfully manufactured without reducing the wages of the laborer down to such a point as to almost beggar him, and that should be avoided if possible, as the American doctrine has been and should be that the laborer is worthy of his hire and should be paid such wages as to render him a comfortable living. Then he will be contented and happy, and cannot be otherwise.

We have learned something, or at least ought to by our war, in relation to free trade in salt. At the commencement of that war we were sending millions of money out of our country annually more than we are now to pay for the labor of other nations. Therefore more than one-half of our salt was furnished to us by other nations. The great calamity gave us a tariff on salt and that stimulated that industry and gave work to thousands of our people. And yet to-day we are sending out of the country millions of money for the same article—money needed at home to give employment to other thousands of our idle men. And the true interest of our country demands an increase of the tariff on this commodity so that we may keep these millions at home for our own people.

The great saline deposits of West Virginia, Ohio, New York, Michigan, and the far West, are absolutely inexhaustible, and they only need the labor to supply our every want in this direction and keep our money and labor at home, and true wisdom demands it.

Another great interest among the many that must have protection is the wool interest. Our wool-growers have all the competition at home they can live under. The Michigan farmer, the Wisconsin farmer, the Ohio farmer, and all the farmers North have to compete to-day with the wool-growers of California, New Mexico, Texas, &c., where their flocks can be kept all the year with scarcely any expense compared with the wool-growers of the North, where they have from four to six months of winter to contend with, and the difference is very great indeed. You cannot ask them to meet any further difficulties. They cannot do it and survive. They will fall under any added weight. Do not venture to burden them any further. Any considerable reduction of the tariff rates on foreign wools would send every sheep in the Northern States to the slaughter pens. There would be, there could be no other course left for the farmers of that section of our country; and I repeat, do not cause such a fearful calamity to befall our people. It will not do.

Our iron interests are immense and must not be forgotten nor abandoned. We have had nonsense enough in the past on this subject. When we consider the fact that nearly if not quite fifty thousand miles of railroad iron has been laid down in the United States, brought three thousand miles across a dangerous ocean, for which this country has paid the gold and silver to England, when all of that money should have been kept at home and paid to our own people, giving employment to hundreds of thousands of men; when we remember, too, that by our fostering care of the iron interest latterly, we have so encouraged and strengthened the industry that a competition has grown up at home which has reduced the price of railroad iron from, say, $90 per ton to $35 to $40.

Now, suppose we should throw down the bars and open all the gates so far as this one branch of business is concerned. What would become of our iron mills in a little time? What would be the result upon our extensive mining operations? They have all they can do now to stand under the stringency of the money market and the intense home competition. The old story would be told again. History would most certainly repeat itself. Old England, Germany, and Belgium would rush their iron and steel into our markets, at a loss if necessary, until the mills in America were silent and the forges cold, and then they would restore the old prices, or at least approximate them, and our railroad-builders would be driven to pay $60 or $70 per ton for railroad iron. Can any man who has kept his eyes open to the truth of history doubt this for a moment? But some friend says we only want a tariff for revenue. That is the policy of this Government. Oh, but what is a tariff for revenue? What does it mean? There is more mystery about this matter than necessary. The truth is that the revenue results from and follows the tariff. When the tariff is low the revenue is low, and always will be. When the tariff is high the revenue is high, and will be so. This is the experience of the country from our earliest existence as a nation's unvarying experience. And why is it so? There is a good reason for this somewhere. It is simply because the result of it is to make the people rich, and the unchanging influence of free trade is to make them poor. And why? Why does protection make the people rich and the contrary impoverish? This is a simple problem and capable of being solved without difficulty. That the practical workings of theories is as above, the history of this country and others as above shown proves beyond a peradventure.

Now for the why and the wherefore. Because protection gives employment to the people, and the want of it leaves them in idleness. In other words labor is the great source of wealth; idleness the great source of poverty and want. Let your legislation be in such a direction as to give employment to the people and then you are safe. An industrious people, with ample work for the masses, at good wages, can never be in want to any great extent; and therefore wise legislation will seek to give work to the people and then they will take care of themselves. The only remaining question is how can this be done? Can it be done by legislating in the interest of labor over the sea? Can it be done by throwing hundreds of millions of dollars into the hands of British manufacturers, by which they can do the work our people are waiting for, and leaving them to wait and starve?

Free trade is the wildest nonsense in the world, and it seems that we have had enough of it to understand all about it.

Hear what the Duke of Wellington said about it over thirty years ago. He said:

That when free trade was talked of as existing in England it was an absurdity. There was no such thing, and there could be no such thing as free trade in that country. We proceed, says he, on the system of protecting our own manufactures, and our own produce, the produce of our labor and our soil; of protecting them for exportation, and protecting them for home consumption; and on that universal system of protection it was absurd to talk of free trade.

England is approaching more nearly a free-trade standard than in Wellington's time, but she is far from free trade to-day, but she does hope to lure this country into following her example just so far as possible, and far enough so that she can destroy us. She envies our position and influence in the markets of the world and longs to wipe us out as a commercial nation, and she can only do it—enticing us to embark on this free-trade ocean and then she can see us sinking, sinking out of sight. There is no success like success; so there is no wisdom like that purchased by experience. Knowledge gained by actual experience cannot be disproved. It cannot be denied to the man who solved the difficulty himself. What a supreme work of folly it would be to essay to prove to Captain Eads the impracticability of constructing the jetties at the mouth of the Father of Waters, he having himself constructed them. So I may say, with equal consistency, what foolishness to attempt to establish the fact to the American people that free trade is a good thing when the actual experience has proved the reverse; and how absurd to try to convince the nation that protection is unwise, when the opposite has been demonstrated by the actual workings of the system. Can we never be settled upon this question? Must we always be afloat and never know permanence and stability in this matter of protection? Where is our trouble on the tariff? South, nowhere else. Why so? Why not in other sections of the country? Because of the great foreign demand for cotton; that is all the trouble. Why should that demand stand in the way of a thoroughly protective system?

It grew up under the influence of slave labor, under the education of more than a hundred years of slave labor. There is no reason in the world, now that that old system of labor is ended, that the South should not manufacture her own great staple and supply the world largely from her own looms, the work of her own hands. She should not continue forever to pay tribute to old England or New England, but should do her own work and enrich herself and make her sunny land the beautiful land of the world. The wealth of the South is pouring into the two Englands to-day, and it ought not to be so. Southern interests demand a new departure. Swing open your doors to friendly competition in building Lowells and Manchesters along your great rivers, and the South will awaken to a new life undreamed of in the past. Put on the tariff and keep old England out, and keep your money in; that is the true policy of that section. That is the true policy financially, and politically as well. The old barrier between the North and South can never be entirely thrown down and scattered so as to never stumble on it again until this question of the tariff can be removed out of the way. This can never be done until the cotton States view their interests in a different light from the present. The North cannot prosper under free trade; neither can the South, except for the present. Sending abroad the products of the soil and leaving nothing behind to recuperate the exhausted lands, as has been the practice of the cotton States, is certain ruin to them in the long run, and wisdom calls for a change, which can only be done by building up manufactures there and diversifying the labor of the people, and thus the country can be nourished and sustained and barrenness will never come.

The lands in New England are improving every year. Let the same course be pursued in the South and it will become the garden of the nation in a century, and this disturbing element in our national councils will disappear forever. The unfortunate manner of doing business

South results in the cotton States constantly coquetting with England, our great rival and enemy. Could we but remove this disturbance we would go on to a greatness and unity that would astonish the world and ourselves as well; and this can only be accomplished by trade and the encouragement of manufactures in the South; so I say, build them up and let both of the Englands take care of themselves; make your own fabrics and supply the markets as you ought and then the tariff question will be settled, and we shall have no more trouble. This foreign market has ever been the discordant note in our music. It has made us all of our trouble, that and the slave labor; that has kept out manufactures. Once they come in, the trouble is ended. We hold, and the history of protection the world over proves, the correctness of our proposition: that the labor of a country should be diversified; that the industrial interests should be multiplied; that no country exclusively agricultural is a happy, prosperous, or rich country; agricultural countries are always poor and must be; that the best interests of every country demand that the production of all commodities should be encouraged which are capable of being produced; that all should be protected, and amply protected, too; that every branch of industry is more or less dependent upon all others, and that a proper system of protection is the legislation needed for all branches of industry.

The reasons for encouraging diversity of human labor are that all men are not fitted by natural faculties, neither are they by disposition or inclination, for the same pursuit or business. This is one of the wise provisions of all-wise and good Providence, and will work for the best good of all men in every age and clime. And there is hardly a country that is adapted but to one branch of labor or industry; and certainly our country is not one of them—any part of it. And it would seem as if a common-sense view of the matter would lead every candid mind to the conclusion that we should so manage our affairs as to make ourselves independent of every other nation, and be able to supply ourselves with the necessities of life and the means of defense.

The three great industries of this country—agriculture, manufactures, and commerce—are so connected that when one suffers they all suffer, and to aid any one of them is to aid all three. Their interests do not run in opposite directions, but in the same current. Some seem to think this is not true. Some seem to think they are in conflict. There could be no greater mistake. When one languishes the others sicken and languish too, and will; and you cannot help it.

No nation wholly agricultural or wholly commercial can be prosperous and happy. Our own country furnishes conclusive evidence of the fact that agriculture cannot prosper without manufactures. It was to relieve us from a state of dependence upon foreign nations for supplies of manufactured goods and to provide an additional market for our surplus agricultural products that the power of the General Government to encourage domestic manufactures was created. The wisdom of thus providing a home market for the products of agriculture stands vindicated by the opinions not only of the most eminent statesmen and ablest writers on political economy of the world, but the practice and experience of every civilized and prosperous nation. In proof of our position we cite Smith's Wealth of Nations, Hamilton's Report on Manufactures, Anderson on National Industry, Cooper's Principles of Political Economy, Chaptal, Washington, Jefferson, Madison, Monroe, Jackson, Buchanan, Clay, Webster, Stewart; and could multiply the number of great names almost indefinitely.

I yield the remaining fifteen minutes of my time to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

CURRENCY.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Speaker, I ought to apologize perhaps for troubling you at this time, but I am anxious to get a matter of very considerable interest before the House in the RECORD, because I propose on Monday next, if I can get the floor, to ask a two-third vote upon the measure, and I desire it should be open to examination before the House shall be called to vote upon it. I do not believe in passing bills affecting great interests by a two-third vote without discussion. And the measure I present will not be a bill. I propose a resolution which I will read and then explain the reason for it:

Resolved, That the Committee on Banking and Currency be instructed to report to this House forthwith a proper bill or bills—

First. To provide for the reissue of the fractional currency of the denomination of fifty and twenty-five cents; for the withdrawal of subsidiary silver coins of the same denomination now in circulation as fast as they may be received into the Treasury, and prevent further issue thereof.

Second. To provide for the printing and issue of twenty millions of legal-tender notes of the denominations of one, two, and five dollars, in equal proportions, to be paid from the Treasury for the current expenses of the Government for circulation among the people.

You will remember, sir, we withdrew the fifty and twenty-five cent fractional currency from circulation, and substituted therefor the silver half and quarter dollar. Now, I think the general opinion of the people of the country is that was the most convenient currency we ever had. There are many uses for which it is convenient which the silver half and quarter dollar do not have. For instance, all small sums to be transmitted by mail practically cannot be transmitted now. A silver half dollar breaks the envelope of its own weight. If it does not break it of its own weight it tells everybody it is there, and somebody else breaks it, and it does not reach its destination. [Laughter.] My attention was called to this by a very practical man in Massachusetts, a large seed producer, who paid a very large postal revenue. In his business, which requires to be transmitted to him fifty and twenty-five cents for packages of seed all over the country, he found in a few months a loss as high as $4,000 a month for the want of some means of sending the money to him in these small sums. And so small subscriptions for various publications and periodicals cannot be sent.

It may be said, Why not get a postal order? That postal order to send fifty or twenty-five cents would cost ten cents. Therefore we cannot transmit by mail, and any one who tries to transmit an uneven sum by mail will find, if he does not get a postal order, it will give him great trouble. Now, there would be no objection, it seems to me, to the remonetization of this most convenient of all convenient currency, which nothing but extreme folly, approaching in my judgment to idiocy, ever caused to be taken out of circulation.

I have not provided in the instructions to the committee there shall be any extension of what is called, I believe—it ought not to be so called—an increase of currency, but I have simply provided the silver half and quarter dollar shall be withdrawn. But I am not particular about that. You get the others out and these will go in of their own motion.

Then you observe there is another provision here; and that is that one, two, and three dollar greenbacks shall be issued to the amount of $20,000,000. I do not care for inflation to that amount—although it is folly to talk about inflation for $20,000,000. Currency is the money of retail, to do retail business; and one-hundred and five-hundred and one-thousand dollar bills are not money at all. They are simply large, convenient checks. It is supposed and believed by those who have examined the subject that 95 per cent. of all the business of the country is done by the check-book, the ledger, the bill of lading, and other forms of mercantile security, and that currency only does the business of retail of about 5 per cent. and it needs to be small for that purpose.

Banks under the old system used to be very fond of putting out their small bills, ones, twos, threes, and fives. Why? Because they went into circulation, were worn out, and lost. There was a great profit on them, and there being a great profit on them, the circulation being for a long time, they were a favorite issue for all banks. But now no matter what the size of the bill if it once gets out into circulation it never comes home to the bank, and it takes from three to five years to get in the bills of a national bank when it is wound up. And the banks have to pay for printing the bills. And it costs just as much to print a one-dollar bill as to print a thousand-dollar bill. Therefore the banks are withdrawing all their small bills and only issue large bills of ten, twenty, fifty, and five hundred dollars. And the consequence is that all over the country there is a great dearth of small bills; especially all over the agricultural portion of the country. And the design of this resolution is to have the Government provide those small bills as the banks do not issue them and do not care to issue them. And then the devil entered into somebody a year ago and there was an attempt to contract the currency by taking in all the small bills; and there have been about sixteen millions of them taken in. It was said that was the best way to begin to contract the currency—to contract the small bills. Now I want those set afloat again because I say again currency is the money of retail; and when men talk about an overflowing currency they have not, in my judgment, very much idea about what they are talking of.

We are told we have a great deal too much currency, because we have a great many large bills; and we have got money, we have got currency—meaning thereby bank-bills and greenbacks—to the amount of about six hundred and fifty millions. And it is said we do not need so much; that before the war we had only about two hundred and fifty millions, and we have not had any such increase of population as corresponds to the increase of currency. But did it ever occur to gentlemen that with this money of retail we are doing four, five, six, seven, eight times as much business, retail business, now as before the war? Let us take some examples. Before the war we had but twenty-seven thousand miles of railroad. Now we have seventy-seven thousand miles; and all railroad business, as far as the carrying of passengers is concerned, is done by currency, and largely the freight business also. The receipts of the Post-Office before the war were only about eight or nine millions; now they are forty millions, all done by currency. The telegraph had hardly got started before the war; now its receipts are sixty and seventy millions a year, all done by currency. The express companies had hardly got from large city to large city before the war. Now the express goes into every hamlet all over the country; and its business is all done by currency, and small currency at that.

As I have said, I do not reckon five-hundred-dollar and one-thousand-dollar bills as currency. They are only large checks. Therefore I have introduced this resolution, and I put it in the RECORD so that anybody who cares to do so may examine it; and I suppose everybody that cares anything about the convenience of the people will examine it; but those who have the convenience of bankers and brokers in their minds and that only, will not, or, if they do, it will not make any impression on their heads. I put it on the RECORD that all gentlemen may see it before they are called to vote upon it, and for no other purpose whatever.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Wisconsin, addressed the House on the payment of arrears of pensions. [His remarks will appear in the Appendix.]

TEXAS PACIFIC RAILROAD.

Mr. DICKEY. Mr. Speaker, the bill proposed by the Committee on the Pacific Railroad is for the United States to aid in the construction of the Texas Pacific Railway by guaranteeing the payment of interest on the bonds of the corporation that desires to build a railroad from Fort Worth, in Texas, to Ship's Channel, in the Bay of San Diego, on the Pacific coast, being about fourteen hundred miles.

The guarantee asked for is $20,000 per mile for eleven hundred and fifty miles, and $35,000 per mile for two hundred and fifty miles. Also a guarantee of interest on a second series of bonds to the extent of $5,000 per mile for the whole road. These bonds are to run fifty years, and the interest, in gold, to be paid by the United States half-yearly at 5 per cent. per annum for that time.

The total amount of bonds to be issued is $38,750,000. This fixes the liability of the Government on the bonds of this corporation at $1,937,500 annually for the period of fifty years, amounting in the aggregate to the sum of $96,875,000, or the sum of $69,196.42 per mile for the whole distance, to be given to this corporation, when it is claimed by the advocates of the measure that the road will cost not to exceed $32,000 per mile.

But independent of this demand, I am opposed to the principle involved in the bill, and to all similar legislation. And were all doubts removed as to the principle involved, I should still oppose it on grounds of expediency, having before me the lessons of the past and the extraordinary demands of the present.

The schemes that have grown up under the congressional construction of the power "to establish post-offices and post-roads" and the measures now pending in this Congress under the pretense of "national necessity" and the public good are absolutely startling. It is a part of my purpose, in the remarks I now propose to make, to present to Congress and the country a brief synopsis of a few of the pressed upon Congress, with a view of converting the Treasury of the United States into a loan office for the benefit of railroad corporations and making the Government their surety and bondsman.

Some of these measures propose to extend the time to insolvent corporations in which to complete their contracts and increase their liabilities. Others propose that the Government shall issue millions of greenbacks to railroad companies to enable them to construct their roads; and others still demand that they shall receive from the Treasury the bonds of the United States, to be secured to the Government by mortgage upon the road to be built; but all of them having the one general aim, and that, to reach down into the Treasury and still further involve an already overburdened people. Any one of these schemes is just as plausible as any of the others, and has just as much merit. And, if the principle is sound, there is no reason in the world why we should not at once organize and incorporate one grand "national railway company of the United States of America," with full power to lease or purchase and consolidate all the railways of the country into one, and to enter upon and condemn real estate that may be necessary for the great objects of the corporation.

All this can be done under the doctrine of the public good and "national necessity" with as great propriety as any of these bills can be passed; and it would have the effect of answering completely the argument of "national necessity," because of the want of competition, for then the Government would so regulate the rates as not to be oppressive upon the people.

UNJUST TAXATION.

But the whole doctrine is false and the plea of "national necessity" fallacious, having, as it has, for the basis of its existence the mere desires of stock-jobbers and railroad rings, which it seems to me is in fact its chief resting-place, and is not such a foundation as ought to move this body to recognize it.

I deny that the power to establish post-offices and post-roads is a power to aid corporations by granting them the public lands, indorsing their bonds, or loaning them money to build railways, over which the mails are to be carried, upon such contract as to price to be paid for such service as the corporation and the Government may afterward make.

The building of railways and the working of them are industries as much so as manufactories or any other business in which private citizens engage. In aiding these railways we take from the Treasury and patrimony of the people their money and property to advance the interests of an industry, in behalf of a certain class, without the remotest idea that it will ever be returned. It is in fact a tax. I know it is said "that if the Government effects, on the one hand, a lower price for transportation by railway it may well, on the other hand, increase the tax upon the people, and that a compensation will be arrived at in this manner." But this is not true. The increase of tax sustained by each citizen cannot be made proportionate to the use each may make of the railway. Such a distribution of the taxes is impossible in practice, for it would happen that he who could make little or no use of the railway would pay the tax for him who constantly uses it, which would be gross injustice; yet such is in fact the practical effect of these measures. But let us look at some of these bills

NOW BEFORE CONGRESS.

One of them is to provide for the construction of a railway from San Antonio to Eagle Pass, on the Rio Grande, and requires the Secretary of the Treasury to issue bonds of the United States to the Galveston, Harrisburgh and San Antonio Railroad Company to the amount of the cost per mile of the road, but not to exceed $25,000 per mile for one hundred and sixty miles, which would require $4,000,000. These bonds of the Government are to be given to the road in exchange for its bonds and are to bear interest at the rate of 4 per cent. in gold.

Another of these bills provides for the construction of the Southern Maryland Railroad, and requires the Secretary of the Treasury to indorse the guarantee of the United States upon the bonds of the corporation to the amount of $15,000 per mile for eighty miles, amounting to the sum of $1,200,000, the Government to be secured by mortgage on the road. The bill under consideration is an amendment to the act incorporating the Texas and Pacific Railway Company and to aid in its construction. This corporation by this bill is authorized to create and deposit with the Secretary of the Treasury its bonds to the amount of $20,000 per mile of the whole road, except for the mountain country of two hundred and fifty miles; the bonds are to be to the amount of $35,000 per mile, but the whole not to exceed $31,750,000. A second series of bonds are to be issued, and in like manner deposited, to the amount of $5,000 per mile, making a total of $36,750,000, to be secured by mortgage on the road, and the land given to the corporation by the State of Texas.

The Secretary of the Treasury is required to indorse upon these bonds the guarantee of payment of interest at 5 per cent. in gold semi-annually by the United States. The corporation (the mortgagee) is then authorized to sell the mortgaged Texas lands at its own price, to create a sinking fund with which to redeem its bonds and pay back the interest so advanced by the Government. It is further provided that the corporation shall relinquish to the United States the grant of lands made to it in New Mexico, Arizona, and California, except the right of way, upon the express condition and for the express purpose that the Government shall sell said lands and appropriate one-half the proceeds to the use of said corporation in the payment of interest on its bonds. This corporation is also authorized to extend its line eastward to the east bank of the Mississippi River, under the same terms as to bonds to be guaranteed by the United States.

Another bill appropriates $20,000 to make a survey for a railroad from Austin, Texas, to the Gulf of California.

Another appropriates out of the Treasury of the United States $6,000 per mile, for a distance of three hundred and fifty-two miles, for the construction of its railroad, to the Galveston and Camargo Railway Company, making the sum to be paid in cash by the Government, $2,112,000.

Another still is the creation of a corporation with authority to build a railroad from some point near New York to Council Bluffs, with branches to Chicago and Saint Louis. This grand corporation is to issue bonds and stocks and borrow money thereon to the amount of $30,000 per mile for thirty-five hundred miles, making the sum of $105,000,000 upon which the Government is to become surety. In addition to this the corporation may issue its certificates of stock to the amount of $52,500,000, making a grand total of bonds, coupon stock, and certificates of stock of $157,500,000; all this grand scheme, with the aid of the Government, to be consummated by this giant corporation without one dollar of its own money. Of course the Government is to have the privilege of a mortgage upon the proposed road.

I have noticed these few of the forty or fifty projects now before Congress, with a view to conveying some idea of the character and growing magnitude of these schemes and of the proposed legislation in their behalf. There is no distinction in principle between them. One is just as meritorious and as deserving of friendly consideration as another.

Suppose we make a more concise statement of these six modest demands:

Galveston, Harrisburgh and San Antonio Railway Company.....	$4,000,000
Southern Maryland Railway Company.....	1,200,000
Texas and Pacific Railroad Company.....	38,750,000
Galveston and Camargo Railroad Company.....	2,112,000
Survey, Austin to Gulf of California.....	20,000
Railway from New York to Council Bluffs and branches.....	157,500,000
	203,582,000
Add bonds already issued Pacific Railroad.....	64,623,512
	268,205,512

Giving us the sum of $268,205,512 in bonds, stocks, certificates of indebtedness, and cash, in which the Government is sought to be mixed and charged either as sponsor or principal or guarantor in some shape or other.

The money is to be directly appropriated from the Treasury, the bonds of the Government to be issued, or the interest on corporation bonds to be guaranteed by the United States, and so securing in advance a certain dividend to stockholders.

Sir, when we consider our immense debt of over $2,000,000,000, the general distress and stagnation of business all over the land, and that bankruptcies are occurring among our business men at the rate of from eight to ten thousand annually, would it not be far more appropriate for the representatives of the people to give their undivided attention to those measures which propose relief to them, rather than be considering measures like these, for the sole benefit of corporations, which, created and sustained by the strong power of the Government, invariably become the oppressors of the people.

ACTS OF 1862-'64.

When in 1862 the bill to construct "a railroad from the Missouri River to the Pacific Ocean" was under discussion in the Senate, Mr. Wilson, of Massachusetts, said:

I have studied the railroad system of this country, and its condition, and I make the prediction here to-day, and let it go upon the record, that the man is not born in this country, nor is there born the grandfather of the man in this country, who will ever see this nation get back this money. It is an impossibility. The road will never be worth it. * * * I do not expect any of our money back. I believe that no man can examine this subject and come to the conclusion that it will come back in any other way than is provided for in the bill; and that provision is for carrying of the mails and doing certain other work for the Government of the United States. In that way we are to get our compensation, and in my judgment it will be ample and complete. But the idea that the $16,000 or the $48,000 a mile we put into the road is ever to be received back into the Treasury of the United States, is as visionary as anything that ever entered the brain of any man.

And what he then uttered as a prediction is true now, for that road is in arrears on interest account with the Government many millions of dollars, and will be when the bonds fall due. The amount received by the Government for carrying the mails is all that any of these roads pretend to pay and all the Government ever will get for this vast expenditure of the people's money and property.

I do not believe the Government ever would have been involved in the construction of this Pacific Railroad in the manner it was, had not the project been pressed upon Congress by the great railroad lobby which took possession of that body during the days of our great civil war, when the doctrines of "national necessity" and "military necessity," subverted every idea of constitutional limitation.

Let us see what sprang out of the acts of 1862-'64: The Central Branch, Union Pacific Railroad Company; the Sioux City Pacific Railroad Company; the Kansas Pacific Railroad Company; the Central Pacific Railroad Company; the Western Pacific Railroad Company; the Union Pacific Railroad Company.

The Western Pacific Company became consolidated with the Central Pacific and is now known by that name.

The Government of the United States issued its bonds to the several railway companies, to run thirty years at 6 per cent. interest, payable semi-annually, (the Government paying the interest,) to the amount of $64,623,512.

On these bonds we have paid, donated of the people's money, since 1864, interest to the sum of $37,896,334.50 up to January 31, 1878.

These bonds, so issued in aid of the construction of "a railroad from the Missouri River to the Pacific Ocean," were secured to the Government by a first mortgage on the road to be built and its land. But having secured these subsidies, and not having completed the road, these corporations, by some secret legerdemain known on those in the ring, in June, 1864, procured such action of Congress as to permit the corporations to issue their own bonds to an amount equal to those of the United States, and secure them by a mortgage prior to that of the Government. Before this amendatory act of 1864 the Government seemed to be perfectly secured from loss or hazard even in this most extraordinary and doubtful conduct.

The effect of this act was to wipe out and destroy forever the last vestige of security held by the United States, and literally rob the people of these enormous sums of money for the benefit of corporations that constantly cry give, give.

Mr. Washburne, of Illinois, who opposed this swindle, said:

Now, it will be recollected that the fifth section of the existing law provides for the repayment of the bonds issued to the company, and declares that the issue and delivery of them to the company shall ipso facto constitute a first mortgage on the whole line of road and telegraph, together with the rolling-stock. This was the security which Congress had a right to demand of any company that should be organized. It was its duty to require it unless it was intended to surrender up everything and place the most gigantic interests at the feet of the company, without control and without challenge. We donated, as I have before stated, millions upon millions of acres of the public lands to the company for this purpose; then we agreed to give our bonds for the amount, with the interest thereon, of $98,000,000, and if Congress had required less than a first mortgage as its security it would, in my judgment, have been derelict in its duty to the country, whose interests in this regard it can alone protect.

What is now proposed by this amendment? I demand that gentlemen shall look at it; let the mirror be held up to nature. Nothing less than the Government, with its liability of a hundred millions, shall relinquish its first mortgage and subordinate its lien to the liens of all the companies created for building the road. The bonds of the United States are to be issued to the company, and the Government is to have no prior lien for its security; but by this provision the company, representing as it may but 1 per cent. or a little over of the amount that the Government is liable for is to subordinate that Government to its own interests, raise money on the means that the Government has furnished, give a first mortgage for the security of that money, and leave the United States as a second mortgagee, obliged to pay off the first mortgage before it can be in a position to take advantage of any security there might by possibility be as a second mortgagee. But who is wild enough to believe that should the provisions of this section become a law the remaining security of the Government will be worth a straw?

It is worse than idle to contend that we shall have any security left for all our liability if this bill shall pass. And further, by the fifth section of the law bonds cannot be issued till forty consecutive miles of the road are fully completed and equipped. It is now proposed by this tenth section to strike out "forty" and make it "twenty." This company, not content with snatching from the Government the security it now holds for the bonds it issues, cannot even wait to finish the forty miles of road at present required before grabbing what is proposed to put into their hands, but they must cut it down so they can go in on twenty miles. Sir, on my responsibility as a Representative I pronounce this as the most monstrous and flagrant attempt to overreach the Government and the people that can be found in all the legislative annals of the country. When we look at the original law with all its liberal and just provisions, when we look at the company organized under it and see how far it has failed to meet its proper obligations, and consider the extraordinary amendments here proposed, are we not filled with astonishment at what is demanded of us as the guardians of the people's rights? Indeed, may we now exclaim:

Can such things be,
And overcome us like a summer's cloud,
Without our special wonder?

But the amendment passed, and the Government had a secondary security, which in this case is equivalent to none. (See Globe, volume 53, pages 32, 67.)

The liabilities of these corporations upon these bonds alone may be stated in round numbers as follows:

Union Pacific.....	$75,000,000
Kansas Pacific.....	25,000,000
Central Branch.....	3,000,000
Sioux City Pacific.....	3,000,000
Central Pacific.....	80,000,000
Total.....	186,000,000

Upon the maturity of the bonds of two only of these companies, the Union and the Central Pacific, the United States will have paid for their benefit in cash out of the Treasury the sum of $154,258,137, and there is to-day no satisfactory plan or reasonable expectation of this money being repaid by these companies.

WHERE WILL IT END?

These astounding facts ought to create a wholesome apprehension in the Representatives of the people that would at least cause them to hesitate and inquire with an earnest seriousness becoming their responsibilities where this character of legislation will lead. Or have we gone so far that we shall say we are willing to adopt by degrees of this kind the theories of the imperialists of this country and acknowledge "that the people of the United States is an independent political society, with its own organization and government, possessing in itself inherent and absolute power of legislation; that the States do not possess, each in itself, absolute power in regard to anything; that the several States composing the Union are creatures of the one body-politic composed of the whole people of the United States?"

Sir, I had been taught the very reverse of this, and to believe that the Union was the creature of the States, possessing only such power and limited to such authority as the States had delegated to it. Will any one deny that Federal authority for legislative purposes is limited to certain enumerated cases, which fix a boundary line, beyond which Congress cannot legally go? Its business is not to legislate for the management of individual affairs, but to enact such general laws as concern all the States as members of the Union under the specified powers found in the Constitution. But this doctrine of "national necessity," "public good," and other vague phrases, sets up the broad, indefinite, and uncertain claim that such power belongs to the Federal Government as its Representatives adjudge belongs to it. If this be so, the limitations of the written Constitution are worthless, and we at once become an unlimited, imperial Government. This doctrine cannot be true and the Republic exist. Let us remember that we are a "Union of States and not a united state;" that one of the great objects of our written Constitution is to limit the power of the Federal Government and thus secure the people from that very character of power, tyranny, and despotism from which those who framed it had just emancipated themselves. They, sir, had suffered the oppressions of unlimited power, or rather that power which the British government adjudged belonged to itself, and emerging from the throes of revolution, the fathers of the Republic—

Guided Freedom in the path they saw
Led out of chaos into light and law,
Peace, not imperial, but republican,
And order pledged to all the Rights of Man.

Sir, there are two ways of destroying the Republic: that of force and military power, and the other by a "chain of usurpations and encroachments" upon the Constitution, under the guise of "public good" and "national necessity," and the first having failed, the latter, by legislation of the character of which I have spoken, is opening channels into the very citadel of our liberties and there creating and fostering a monster that in time will destroy us. There is no end, no limit, no boundary to the logic of power. If Congress has power to donate indirectly money or land to a corporation or to an agent, the creature of its own creation, for the purpose of constructing railways, may it not directly appropriate money and land to build the railway itself? If it may build railways under the power to establish post-roads, may it not with equal propriety establish and publish, at such points as Congress may fix, national magazines for the education of the people, under the "general welfare" clause, which may mean the power Congress shall adjudge belongs to itself? And if it may do these things, why may it not establish and maintain national infirmaries for the benefit of the millions of paupers and tramps which this class legislation has inflicted upon the country?

But what care stock-jobbers and gamblers for constitutions or constitutional limitations? They would see them torn into fragments, if they may only be permitted to seize and prey upon the Treasury and patrimony of the people.

Their very instinct seems to be debt and taxation, and they look upon our Government as though it was founded chiefly for the purpose of dividing money and distributing the public lands among soulless corporations.

CENTRALIZATION.

Since the accession of the republican party to power, we have witnessed the General Government occupying new and strange attitudes toward the States. Unceasing efforts have been made to enlarge its powers, and in many instances, without warrant of law, acts have been committed by those in authority which must ever remain as blotches upon the pages of our nation's history.

The school of statesmen who took control in 1861 seem to have regarded the Constitution as conferring unlimited power upon the General Government, and acting upon this theory have ever since treated the States and the people as though all their rights, liberties, and privileges were derived from and in the keeping of a strong, unlimited central government, located at Washington. The doctrine of a double Government, that of the Union and the States, as established by the fathers and maintained by the democratic party, was to be totally abrogated and destroyed. The Federal Government had theretofore been administered for general purposes, and the State governments had been administered for the protection of individuals, their property, and homes, and each government, operating within its own well-defined sphere, had prospered as a people far beyond the glory of the nations of the old world. Each of these governments, carefully keeping within its constitutional jurisdiction, could not embarrass the other, and working harmoniously they were no burden to the people. Taxation fell so lightly that so far as the Federal Government was concerned it was neither felt nor seen by the people.

Upon this division of powers, and the necessity of continuing and maintaining them, I quote the following eloquent and forcible language of Webster:

The first object of a free people is the preservation of their liberty; and liberty is only to be preserved by maintaining constitutional restraints and just divisions of political power. Nothing is more deceptive or more dangerous than the pretense of a desire to simplify government. The simplest are despotisms; the next simplest monarchies; but all republics, all governments of law, must impose numerous limitations and qualifications of authority, and give many positive and many qualified rights. In other words, they must be subject to rule and regulation. This is the very essence of free political institutions. The spirit of liberty is indeed a bold and fearless spirit; but it is also a sharp-sighted spirit; it is a cautious, sagacious, discriminating, far-seeing intelligence; it is jealous of encroachment, jealous of power, jealous of man. It demands checks, seeks for guards; it insists on securities; it intrenches itself behind strong defenses and fortifies itself with all possible care against the assaults of ambition and passion. It does not trust the amiable weakness of human nature, and therefore it will not permit power to overstep its prescribed limits, though benevolence, good-intent, and patriotic purpose come along with it. Neither does it satisfy itself with temporary and flashy resistance to illegal authority. Far otherwise. It seeks for duration and permanence. It looks before and after; and, building on the experience of ages which are past, it labors diligently for the benefit of ages to come. This is the nature of constitutional liberty; and this is our liberty, if we will rightly understand and preserve it.

But a separation of departments, so far as practicable, and the preservation of clear lines of division between them, is the fundamental idea in the creation of all our constitutions; and doubtless the continuance of regulated liberty depends on maintaining these boundaries.

At the period of the formation of our Government there were two leading causes from which our ancestors apprehended danger. One was slavery, out of which a dissolution of the Union might grow, and the other was the spirit of encroachment which "tends to consolidate the powers of all the departments in one, and thus to create, whatever the form of Government, a real despotism."

Thus were dissolution and centralization the recognized and arch enemies of our Republic from the very beginning; and although the one is destroyed by an appeal to war, the other from the very débris of his adversary's carcass springs up more active and dangerous than before. Dissolution and the right of secession occupied one extreme, while centralization and consolidation occupied the other; the one just as near the correct theory of our Government as the other, and both antagonistic to it. When both lived, they operated as checks upon each other; but now that the bolder of the two is dead, the survivor has redoubled its treacherous flatteries. Its lust for power is immeasurable, and its ambition unbounded. It is wily and stealthy, and comes in seductive and questionable shapes. It lurks in every proposition that comes from monopolies and corporations, and in many of its efforts has found ready assistance from that school of politicians who can see nothing in the Constitution except power to do as they please or such power as Congress may adjudge belongs to itself, and this is always done under the pretense of the "general welfare" and "public good."

Centralization is nourished and advanced by all class legislation and is fostered and encouraged when great corporations succeed in drawing the Government into a copartnership with themselves, thus enabling them to amass immense fortunes which necessarily reside in the hands of the few who, by the advantages they have gained, at length cease to ask, but command legislation in their behalf. This is true from the very nature of things, and history establishes what I have said. Legislation of this character is never in the interest of the people, but always adverse to them. It is a system of sapping and mining, stealing away, little by little it may be, but none the less certainly, the forms of settled government and the guarantees of liberty intended to be established by the Constitution for all times and under all circumstances.

Then is it not our duty, as the representatives of the people, to resist these forces by every means in our power, and to preserve to them their possessions, their rights, and their government? "Who shall keep watch in the temple if the watchmen sleep at their posts?"

Of the fundamental principles of the democratic party none is better settled than that the Federal Government is one of limited powers derived solely from the Constitution, and the grants of power shown therein ought to be strictly construed by all the Departments and agents of the Government, and that it is inexpedient and dangerous to exercise doubtful constitutional powers; that the Constitution does not confer upon the General Government the power to commence and carry on a general system of internal improvements. The power to improve the great rivers, harbors, and lakes of the country is one thing, and the power to foster, build up, and enter into copartnership with great corporations and monopolies, or to become their surety and bondsman, is quite another.

WHAT THE REPUBLICAN PARTY HAS DONE.

But let us examine what has been done in this regard since 1861. The following table exhibits how the public domain has been squandered on corporations and monopolies:

1871.....	Texas Pacific Railroad.....	13,400,000
Total number of acres given away.....		285,000,000

Two hundred and eighty-five millions of acres of land given away! What a vast area of the public domain! More land than the whole of the New England States, New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Maryland, Ohio, and Indiana! And yet they still cry Give! Give! when we know the people of all parties everywhere have condemned and denounced these outrages.

Another method, and similar to the one now under consideration, is that of loaning the credit of the Government to these corporations, or becoming their surety for vast sums, which in the end the people will have to pay.

The following table shows what was done for us in this regard:

Bonds issued to Pacific Railway Companies.

Name of railway.	Authorizing act.	Principal.	Interest paid by the United States.
Central Pacific.....	1862 and 1864.....	$25,885,120 00	$14,910,465 67
Kansas Pacific.....	1862 and 1864.....	6,303,000 00	4,049,343 09

Western Pacific.....	1862 and 1864.....	1,970,500 00	1,017,064 14
Sioux City and Pacific.....	1862 and 1864.....	1,628,320 00	936,951 89
Total.....		64,633,512 00	37,896,343 50

Showing that the Government has paid, advanced by loaning its credit and cash to these corporations, the sum of $37,896,343.50, while by transportation of mails, &c., the companies have repaid but little over $9,000,000 to January 31, 1878.

Upon the maturity of the bonds issued in aid of these several corporations the interest paid by the United States will be as follows:

On bonds for the Central Pacific.....	$126,619,733 30
On bonds for the Kansas Pacific.....	30,531,744 30
On bonds for the Union Pacific.....	133,230,000 00
On bonds for the Central Branch.....	7,836,504 96
On bonds for the Western Pacific.....	9,639,197 41
On bonds for the Sioux City.....	7,965,035 16
Total interest.....	316,112,571 79
Add the principal of the bonds.....	64,633,512 00
Grand total.....	380,736,083 79

These alarming schemes, and this vast system, whose pecuniary extent cannot be foreseen, and whose corrupting influences both in and out of Congress have amazed and shocked the moral sense of our people everywhere, ought not now to meet with favor from a party whose watchword in the late presidential campaign was reform of these very abuses, and whose adherents from every stump in the land denounced these land grabs and subsidies as outrages not to be tolerated in the future, and demanded rigid economy in every department of the Government as the crying necessity of the times and of the people.

Sir, let us stand now by the position taken then, and let private capital, as it will, accomplish all the railroad building in this country that has the slightest prospect of being at all successful or profitable.

Let that great party, to whom the people look for relief from the evils and burdens that now oppress them, not be unfaithful or untrue to its ancient faith, nor deceive those who have trusted it. Let it strengthen their faith and encourage their hope.

These great wrongs upon the people of this country should stand as perpetual monuments of warning to this and all future Congresses, and these giant corporations, driven from their greedy land-grabbing schemes by the cry of the people, should not be permitted, in the light of these facts, in a roundabout manner to accomplish even more gigantic robberies.

Let us look more closely at the figures. I have shown that two hundred and eighty-five millions of acres have been donated to these roads. Now, putting this at $1.25 per acre, and we have $356,250,000. Now add to this the $96,000,000 in bonds for which the Government is bound and we have the enormous sum of $452,250,000 absolutely given of the people's property and money to build up corporations and monopolies, with colossal fortunes and powers, soon to become the oppressors of the people and masters of the Government. Their demands are unceasing and their arrogance unbounded. And while it is true the people have no remedy for these great wrongs, it is within our power and it is our duty to prevent further similar outrages. It is well said that crime ought always to be punished and suppressed; but it is far better by wise legislation to prevent it. No government can long sustain itself against the continued assaults of these mighty corporations. These the very creatures of its own creating become its most dangerous, subtle, and powerful enemies, for the reason that through their wealth they control and direct its legislation, utterly regardless of the people who are the rightful masters.

This Government was never intended as a mere sponsor and godfather for corporations and monopolies, which it is fast becoming through the unjust class legislation that has been almost its sole business for the past few years; and the sooner it shall be wholly divorced from this incubus which is crowding out the light of nobler works and purer laws, the sooner we may hope for lighter burdens and more prosperous days. When in the past has there been any legislation in behalf of the people or for their interests? Look over the statutes passed during the last ten years. What have been the great leading acts, and in whose interest has all legislation been conducted?

BONDHOLDERS' ACTS.

In addition to the stupendous wrongs to which I have called attention by which the people were robbed of both land and money, of the same character and as showing the same tendency to class legislation have been all the financial measures of the past ten years.

Prior to March, 1869, the bonds of the Government issued after 1861, payable in coin, amounted to but the sum of $274,999,800, not payable in gold, but in coin of gold and silver; and these were all the bonds that were by the express language of the statutes creating them payable in coin.

The great mass of the public debt was in bonds issued under acts as follows:

Under the act of February 8, 1861.....	$18,415,000
Under the act of March 2, 1861.....	1,080,850
Under the act of July 17, 1861.....	50,000,000
Under the act of August 5, 1861.....	139,321,200
Under the act of February 23, 1862.....	500,000,000
Under the act of March 3, 1864.....	11,000,000
Under the act of June 30, 1864.....	125,561,300
Under the act of January 28, 1865.....	4,000,000
Under the act of March 3, 1865.....	958,483,300
Total.....	1,907,871,650

This vast sum was payable in legal-tender notes. The several acts creating this vast debt did not provide that it should be paid in coin. But in March, 1869, an act was passed making this debt payable in coin. The bonds representing this debt stood in the market at eighty-eight cents until this act was passed and approved, when they instantly rose to one hundred and five cents, or an advance of seventeen cents on every dollar of the bondholder's investment, thus increasing the value of his bonds over $300,000,000, and saddling that additional burden upon the people.

But it must be remembered that the act of 1869, infamous as it was, still left this debt payable in the coin of the country, gold and silver.

Now comes the fraud, which both Senators and Representatives of the time admit was stolen through Congress, not only without debate, but without their knowledge, in 1873 and 1874, by which silver was demonetized and made a legal tender for but $5, when before it had been a legal tender for the payment of all debts, both public and private, to any amount. By that unjust and unwise act the people were deprived of their lawful right to pay their public debt in gold and silver coin, according to the terms of the contract, and the whole public debt became payable in gold coin alone, again adding vastly to the value of the property of the bondholder, at the expense of the people. Then followed that crowning act of infamy in 1875, requiring the resumption of specie payments on and after January 1, 1879, and this resumption to be necessarily in gold coin, to be accompanied and followed by a most violent and enormous contraction of the already too little currency, which must inevitably bring in its operations bankruptcy and ruin to thousands of our citizens.

THE SILVER BILL.

True, we have recently attempted to alleviate this condition by the passage of a bill to remonetize the silver dollar. And as I had no opportunity of expressing my views upon its passage I may be now permitted to briefly give my reasons for voting for the bill as amended by the Senate. I had voted for the bill as it passed the House, giving free and unlimited coinage. This I believe ought now to be the law. Silver should stand upon an equal footing with gold. This country, the greatest silver-producing country of the world, cannot afford, in debt as we are, to debase and destroy this great source of wealth and relief.

The bill, as amended by the Senate, limiting coinage of the silver dollar to the Government alone, and limiting the amount to $48,000,000 per annum, and it may be but $24,000,000, as it is to be executed by the most inveterate enemy of the silver dollar in the country—I mean the present Secretary of the Treasury—is by no means the bill as I would have it, neither is it what the country expects and requires. But the question was shall we take it in this restricted form or shall we reject it, and thus wholly defeat any hope of relief in any form? It is, I know, niggardly and bears upon its face the marks of the money power. It has been greatly dwarfed in its proportions since it left this House, but I believe it is the best that could be accomplished at the time. It is a clear advance in the interest of the people, and shows a breaking down to that extent of the hitherto formidable and irresistible money power.

It remonetizes the ancient silver dollar and makes it a legal-tender for all debts, public and private, thus re-establishing the law as it existed prior to the sneak-thief act of 1873.

I believe that supplementary and needful legislation will quickly follow and that silver and gold in this country will stand equal before the law. It was a clear, decisive victory in the interest of the people, and being unwilling to lose any opportunity to advance their cause I voted for the bill as amended.

WHY I CITED THESE ACTS.

I have thus briefly noticed these financial measures in this connection for the purpose of showing not only the character of the legislation to which the country has been subjected, but also for the purpose of showing the power and influence that has been controlling our legislation. It was my purpose to call the attention of the country particularly to the fact that the power of their Government is being used to build up an aristocracy of wealth, through class legislation, as well as monopolies of oppression by the creation and support of soulless corporations; that by such legislation the powers of the General Government are necessarily enlarged, to the great injury of the people, far beyond their proper limits, and that by these alliances and entanglements it is permeating every State, county, and township of the Union, dwarfing into insignificance the rights of the States and the people and becoming that consolidated despotism which the enemies of the Republic would make it.

And herein consists in my judgment the great remaining distinctive feature between the parties as such. It is upon the doctrine of local self-government, as its fundamental principle, that the democracy of this country has been enabled to withstand the shocks and battles of the past, and to that principle it owes its present proud attitude. It cannot afford to abandon it or falter in its constant support of that principle, and it must repel every assault upon it, come from where it may. Democracy, based upon any other idea, is a sham and a fraud. We are to judge of the party by its works. We have seen the republican party granting vast areas of the public domain to great corporations, loaning the public credit to monopolies for millions upon millions of dollars, passing act after act wholly in the interest of the money and banking power of the country, and constantly claiming and exercising most extraordinary and unconstitutional powers through the General Government, powers never dreamed to have an existence by the statesmen of the past.

In the days when internal improvements were a party question in this country, when De Witt Clinton had reached the height of his fame and popularity, when schemes of internal improvements were springing up on every hand, no one presumed to advocate the expenditure of more than the surplus revenue of the Government. But now how different; without reluctance or hesitation men are willing, as in the past few years they have done, to still further plunge an already overburdened and overtaxed country deeper and deeper into the vortex of debt and destruction.

DUTY OF THE DEMOCRATIC PARTY.

I know it is diligently sought to keep these questions out of party politics; but the democracy, if true to its ancient doctrines, if it would continue to be the protector and defender of the rights and liberties of the people against the rapid encroachments of these combined powers, must set its face as flint against these and all other schemes of jobbery and corruption and consolidation, and repel the aggressor in whatever form he may appear. A party must and will exist in this country occupying that position, and it is of right the position of the democratic party. That party can and must rescue the Federal Government and its Departments from that reckless extravagance which of late years has marked and disgraced our country. It can and must bring the Government back to a rigid economy and arrest the wholesale plunder of the public Treasury by corporations, monopolies, and favored partisans. It can and must resist the theories of centralization that have had such rapid and alarming growth during the reign of the republican party. It can and must drive from the doors of Congress the money rings, the railroad rings, the whisky rings, and all other rings that have been organized but for plunder, and have been fostered and encouraged these last fifteen years until they have grown fat off the woes and distresses of an outraged people.

It can and must reform and correct the abuses admittedly existing everywhere in the civil service of the country and stay the flood of fraud and corruption which has so frequently startled the nation.

It must adhere to its doctrine that the Federal Government is one of limited power, derived solely from the Constitution, and that it is inexpedient and dangerous to exercise doubtful powers; that one branch of industry must not be fostered to the detriment of others; that every section of the country and every citizen is entitled to a perfect equality of rights and privileges and protection of property. It can and must be true to its ancient and liberty-extending doctrine of local self-government by the people and for the people.

Adhering to these pure principles, as taught and practiced by the fathers of the Republic, and under which our country was prosperous and happy and constitutional liberty sustained and advanced, no party can be wrong or long in rallying to its support the just and patriotic men of the Republic.

It was with gratitude that the country, a few weeks since, saw this House pass by such a large majority an anti-subsidy resolution. Did we mean it or was it a sham? Was it a hollow, demagogical bubble or was it the voice of earnest, honest men? For one I answer, I meant what I said. I go further. I would vote for a constitutional amendment, so as to put at rest this question, forever prohibiting Congress from granting an acre of the public domain to any corporation or permitting the Government in any way whatever to loan its credit or money, aiding corporations of any kind, and I propose at the proper time to submit an amendment to this effect.

CONCLUSION.

I am aware sir, that I am attacking what is called by some a great policy of the Government! But when we consider how and when this policy was adopted and put into execution; when we reflect upon the results that have and are likely to follow if it be pursued, is it not high time that it should be stricken from the catalogue of policies? It may be the policy of corporations and monopolists, but it is not the policy of the people of this country. It is a policy instituted and carried on, which seeks to drag the people after it in positive opposition to their desires. It is a policy of that class legislation which has done so much toward impoverishing and bankrupting the country. It is a policy that constantly devours the time of Congress, to the exclusion of legislation that ought to be devoted to those interests which have been the victims of abuses and wrongs, the necessary outgrowth of class legislation, that should be forever swept from the political arena. It is a policy contrary to the letter and spirit of our free institutions, and one which, from its inception to the present, has been productive of fraud, corruption, bribery, and oppression, that ought to condemn it and blot it out of existence.

INTERSTATE COMMERCE: THE POWER AND DUTY OF CONGRESS TO REGULATE THE RAILWAY CARRYING TRADE AMONG THE STATES.

Mr. TIPTON. Mr. Speaker, I desire to say one thing in connection with what has been said by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. DICKLEY.] It is wholly immaterial to me by what route he arrives at his conclusion. I am not disposed to differ about routes; but I concur in his conclusion, that it is the duty of Congress to vote no more subsidies to corporations. I was glad to hear his remarks, for I have had some suspicion in regard to the other side of the House, as to whether they voted for the resolution offered by the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. BAKER,] to which the gentleman has referred, in good faith, saying that we will vote no more subsidies. In connection with what the gentleman has said upon that subject, I desire to discuss the question of the power of Congress to control the railroads that have already been built. We have, as has been said by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BUTLER] to-night, seventy-seven thousand miles of railroad in this country. In my judgment it is necessary that some legislation should be had by this Congress—and by this Congress I mean the Forty-fifth Congress—by which the railroads in this country that have already been completed should be controlled by legislation. In other words, I desire to discuss the question of the power of Congress, under the Constitution of the United States, to control the interstate commerce of the country.

The power of State Legislatures and of Congress to regulate State and interstate commerce and to prohibit unjust discriminations by common carriers against individuals, communities, and States has agitated the public mind for years. In many of the States such legislation has been had that local discriminations are prohibited, but as yet no action has been taken by Congress tending to prevent discrimination against States or the regulation of interstate commerce.

Mr. Speaker, we have a population of forty-five millions of people, and as has been said, we have 77,470 miles of railroad, besides our means of transportation by water, and our internal commerce is estimated at $25,000,000,000 per annum. It is only when we contemplate the magnitude of our country, its lines of transportation by land and water, and the vast resources of the country, that we are able to comprehend the importance of the commerce of the country. Railroad trains and steamers are constantly in motion, moving the products of the country from one portion of the Union to another. And this is called commerce and was so understood when the Constitution was adopted. The means of transportation were different then, but I shall show that the principle is the same. At the time of the adoption of the Constitution the carrying trade was small as compared with the trade of the present time.

Mr. Speaker, this vast commerce is now mostly carried by corporations organized by special State legislation and claiming certain vested rights by virtue of their charters, under which they claim the right to operate and control the commerce of the country without let or hindrance. That under this claim these corporations discriminate against individuals, communities, and States cannot and will not be denied. And the question now is whether the power of the people to protect themselves against this claim of power has been bartered away by State legislation.

Mr. Speaker, I hope to be able to satisfy Congress and the country by unquestioned judicial authority that these corporations are subject to governmental control, and that it is not within the power of legislative discretion to irrevocably dispose of or waive the right of the people to control the commerce of the country. In Providence Bank vs. Billings, 4 Peters, 563, it was held by the Supreme Court of the United States that—

The great object of an incorporation is to bestow the characters and properties of individuality on a collective and changing body of men. This capacity is always given to such a body. Any privileges which may exempt it from the burdens common to individuals do not flow necessarily from the charter, but must be expressed in it or they do not exist.

This principle has met the approval of the courts from that time to the present. Judge Redfield in delivering the opinion of the court in the case of Thorpe vs. Railroad Company, 27 Vermont, 150, after quoting the language of the Supreme Court of the United States just cited, said:

This is sufficiently explicit, and upon examination will be found, I think, to have placed the matter upon its true basis. In reason it would seem that no fault could be found with the rule here laid down by this great expounder of constitutional law. As to the legislative control it places natural persons and corporations upon the same ground. And it is the true ground and only one upon which equal rights and just liabilities and duties can be fairly based.

Again:

There is also the general police power of a State by which persons and property are subjected to all kinds of restraints and burdens in order to secure the general comfort, health, and prosperity of the State, of the perfect right in the Legislature to do which no question ever was or upon acknowledged general principles ever can be made, so far as natural persons are concerned. And it is certainly calculated to excite surprise and alarm that the right to do the same in regard to railways should be made a serious question.

And in the case of The Bank of The Republic vs. The County of Hamilton, the supreme court of Illinois says:

Corporations are artificial persons endowed with limited powers and capacities, and are subject to the general laws and legislation of the State, the same as natural persons. The natural man is born with sovereign powers and unlimited rights if he be beyond the limits of governments and societies. Upon entering these a portion of his rights are sacrificed against his consent if he objects either to a greater or less extent, as good government may be deemed to require. It would be absurd to suppose that the powers of government are greater over the rights of the being endowed by the Creator than over the one spoken into existence by human laws.

Mr. Speaker, I concede that at one time in this country the opinion obtained to some extent that property in a chartered corporation was more sacred than the property of the individual citizen, but in time this question was fully settled otherwise by the Supreme Court of the United States. In the case of West River Bridge Company vs. Dix, 6 Howard, 563, the court met the question as follows:

The opinion seems to have obtained that the right of property in a chartered corporation was more sacred and intangible than the same right could possibly be in the person of the citizen, an opinion which must be without any grounds to rest upon until it can be demonstrated either that the ideal creature is more than a person or the corporal being is less.

Mr. Speaker, from an examination of these authorities it is clear that the corporations of this country are subject to legislation the same as individuals, and that the property of the stockholder in a chartered corporation is held by the same right that the citizen owns his property.

Mr. Speaker, it is the province and duty of Congress to enact such laws as may be deemed proper upon this question and I deny the power of the Legislature of any State to grant any power to one of these corporations that will prevent Congress from passing any law authorized by the Constitution of the United States. The legislative authority of a Government is a trust which cannot be irrevocably delegated or abandoned, and in support of this view I cite a line of authorities that will command the respect of this House and the country. Judge Marshall asserted the doctrine that I am now contending for, as early as the case of Fletcher vs. Peck, 6 Cranch, 87. He said in this case that—

The principle asserted is that one Legislature is competent to repeal any act which a former Legislature was competent to pass, and that one Legislature cannot abridge the powers of a succeeding Legislature.

And this principle was again fully maintained by Chief-Justice Taney in Charles River Bridge Company vs. Warren, 11 Peters, 420, and in Gosler vs. Corporation of Georgetown, 6 Wheaton, 597; East Hartford vs. Hartford Bridge Company, 10 Howard, 534. In this last case the court refer to the case of Gosler vs. Georgetown, and add:

This case seems to settle the principle that a legislative body cannot part with its powers by any proceeding so as not to be able to continue the exercise of them. It can and should exercise them again and again as often as the public interests require.

Mr. Speaker, sovereignty is inherent in the people, and neither a State nor the General Government can transcend the power conferred by the State constitution and by the Federal Constitution and every State constitution in the Union. The departments of Government are instituted to exercise the functions of government, not to be disposed of, but to be exercised from time to time as the interest of the people may require. Nor can the civil power of a State or of the General Government be made the subject-matter of contract. And, again, the Supreme Court of the United States affirms this principle in Trust Company vs. Debolt, 16 Howard, 431; and Judge Cooley, in his work on Constitutional Limitations, reviews all the authorities, State and Federal, and sums up his conclusions as follows:

It would seem, therefore, to be the prevailing opinion, and one based upon sound reason, that the State could not barter away, or in any manner abridge or weaken, any of these essential powers which are inherent in all governments, and the existence of which in full vigor is important to the well-being of organized society.

Mr. Speaker, these authorities settle the question beyond doubt, and they are sustained by sound reason. I might cite numerous other authorities, but think those cited are sufficient to satisfy the mind of all; but if any man has any doubt upon this question, if he will call on me I will furnish him a brief of additional authorities that will furnish him good reading upon this subject during the balance of this session.

Mr. Speaker, I come now to the question of the power by proper legislation to establish regulation concerning commerce carried on by these corporations among the States and within the States, or, more properly speaking, State and interstate commerce.

Mr. Speaker, the railroads of this country are improved public highways, and were constructed by the aid of the right of eminent domain, and the corporations building and operating the same are public agents, created for the practical administration of the public property and franchises put into their hands to be administered in such manner as the law-making power of the Government may determine. Their use is public and they were created for the public good, for travelers and shippers. They are compelled by law and justice to transport passengers and freight according to the usages of the corporation and for a reasonable compensation. The power of the States to control these corporations within the respective States against unjust discrimination and extortion is now well settled, so far as the same may regulate the commerce of the State.

Now, Mr. Speaker, while the States may lawfully control and regulate their internal State commerce they have no power, as I shall show, to control the interstate commerce of the country. Among the powers expressly conferred upon Congress by the Constitution of the United States is the power "to regulate commerce with foreign nations, and among the several States, and with the Indian tribes." It will not be denied that this clause of the Constitution confers upon Congress power to legislate upon the general subject of the regulation of commerce among the several States. The term commerce means now just what it meant when the Constitution was adopted. The word at that time evidently had a well-defined meaning, although its meaning has been perhaps more authoritatively defined since the adoption of the Constitution. The word simply means intercourse and exchange, both of persons and property, among the several States, and is governed by the enactment of laws prescribing general rules by which it is to be governed. Judge Redfield in his work on railways has this to say:

The natural import and construction of the terms of the Constitution would not seem to admit of much doubt, judging from the language merely. The meaning of the word "commerce" at the time the Constitution was adopted must have been definitely settled and well understood. The word, as well understood, is derived from the Latin commercium, and which is found almost in its original form in most of the languages of modern Europe. It means, in its most literal sense, intercourse and exchange both of persons and commodities. It is more nearly synonymous with "traffic" than with any other word in the language, probably. Its great natural divisions for ages have been foreign and inland. The regulation of all the former and that portion of the latter which extended beyond the limits of a single State was, as we have seen, by the organic law of our National Government secured to the nation, and the remainder was naturally left to the particular State where it exclusively existed. It is obvious that the purpose of the provision was not to be confined to future commerce carried on in the same mode it then was, that is, by ship and boat navigation, propelled exclusively by wind. If that had been so, the provision could not have been applied to that large portion of commerce now carried on by steam-power which has already become very considerable, and is constantly increasing in a rapidly advancing ratio.

The fact that the entire subject of regulating all commerce among the different States, including all the means and appliances by which it was carried on, was committed to Congress, and that thereafter the States were to have no concurrent action in the regulation of the same, would seem to reduce the question of Congress having the power of regulating interstate railway traffic to the single inquiry whether it forms any portion of the commerce of the country which requires to be regulated at all. Those who assume to argue that Congress has no power to regulate the traffic upon these extended lines of railway reaching from one end of the Union to the other must, if they would meet the question fairly, either say the traffic on these extended lines of railways, amounting to many millions annually, probably ten times as much as the entire commerce of the country at the time of the adoption of the Constitution, is not commerce at all, or if it be, is not subject to any regulation whatever. For it is certain the States have neither the power nor capacity to regulate, to any purpose or with any efficiency, this interstate railway traffic. It must, then, come under the control of Congress or be left to its own devices and impulses—an experiment never tried in any other country.—Redfield on Railways, pages 720-722.

But we are not left to text-writers alone for the meaning of the term commerce; we have the definition of the Supreme Court of the United States in Gibbons against Ogden. In 9 Wheaton, page 1, the court say:

The subject to be regulated is commerce, and our Constitution being, as was aptly said at the bar, one of enumeration and not of definition to ascertain the extent of the power, it becomes necessary to settle the meaning of the word. The counsel for the appellees would limit it to traffic, to buying and selling, or the interchange of commodities, and do not admit that it comprehends navigation. This would restrict a general term applicable to many objects; to one of its significations commerce undoubtedly is traffic; but it is something more; it is intercourse. It describes the commercial intercourse between nations and parts of nations in all its branches, and is regulated by prescribing rules for carrying on that intercourse.

And again the court, in the same case, say:

To what commerce does this power extend: the Constitution informs us to commerce "with foreign nations, and among the several States, and with the Indian tribes." It has, we believe, been universally admitted that these words comprehend every species of commercial intercourse between the United States and foreign nations. No sort of trade can be carried on between this country and any other to which this power does not extend. It has been truly said "that commerce, as the word is used in the Constitution, is a unit, every part of which is indicated by the term. If this be the admitted meaning of it in its application to foreign nations it must carry the same meaning throughout the sentence and remain a unit unless there is some plain intelligible cause which alters it. The object to which the power is next applied is to commerce "among the several States." The word "among" means intermingled with a thing which is among others, is intermingled with them. Commerce among the States cannot stop at the external boundary-line of each State but may be introduced into the interior.

It is not intended to say that these words comprehend that commerce which is completely internal, which is carried on between man and man in a State or between different parts of the same State, and which does not extend to or affect other States. Such a power would be inconvenient, and certainly is not necessarily as comprehensive as the word "among" is. It may very properly be restricted to that commerce which concerns more than one. The phrase is not one which would probably have been selected to indicate the completely interior traffic of a State, because it is not an apt phrase for that purpose, and the enumeration of the particular classes of commerce to which the power was to be extended would not have been made had the intention been to extend the power to every description. The enumeration presupposes something not enumerated, and that something, if we regard the language or the subject of the sentence, must be the exclusively internal commerce of the State.

In the State freight-tax case, 15 Wallace, 232, in delivering the opinion of the court, Justice Strong said:

Beyond all question the transportation of freight or of the subjects of commerce for the purpose of exchange or sale is a constituent of commerce itself. This has never been doubted, and probably the transportation of articles of trade from one State to another was the prominent idea in the minds of the framers of the Constitution when to Congress was committed the power to regulate commerce among the several States. . . . nor does it make any difference whether this interchange of commodities is by land or by water. In either case the bringing of the goods from seller to the buyer is commerce.

And again the court say:

The rule has been asserted with great clearness that whenever the subjects over which a power to regulate commerce is asserted are in their nature national or admit of one uniform system or plan of regulation, they may be justly said to be of such a nature as to require exclusive legislation by Congress. Sure transportation of passengers or merchandise through a State or from one State to another is of this nature.

This power, like all other powers vested in Congress, is complete, and is only limited, if it be limited in any way, by the Constitution of the United States. Upon this point Chief-Justice Marshall in Gibbons vs. Ogden, already cited, uses the following language:

It is the power to regulate that is to prescribe the rule by which commerce is to be governed. This power like all others vested in Congress is complete in itself.

To the same effect, see Story on the Constitution, section 1067.

The rule is this, as I understand it, that all the external concerns of the nation and those internal concerns which affect the States generally are within this provision of the Constitution of the United States. But, on the other hand, all those concerns which are completely within a particular State and which do not affect other States are vested in the State. Incidentally the concerns of a State may become connected with interstate commerce, but not necessarily, and in Munn vs. The State of Illinois, (4 Otto, 155,) the Supreme Court held that until Congress acts in reference to their interstate relations the State may exercise all the powers of government over its domestic concerns, although in so doing it may indirectly operate upon commerce outside of the State.

Mr. Speaker, the line of demarcation drawn between the authority of the States and Federal Government is so clear that no man need err or be mistaken if he will take the trouble to inform himself. The local commerce of a State is of course exclusively vested in the State, and that which belongs to more than one State belongs to Congress. The line which divides the State from the Federal jurisdiction is thus defined by the court:

The genius and character of the whole Government seem to be that its action is to be applied to all external concerns of the nation and to those internal concerns which affect the States generally, but not to those which are completely within a particular State, which do not affect other States, and with which it is not necessary to interfere for the purpose of executing some of the general powers of the Government. The completely internal commerce of a State, then, may be considered as reserved for the State itself.

This power of Congress to legislate does not stop at the jurisdictional lines of the several States, but may be exercised wherever the subject exists. Take a line of railroad leading from New York to Chicago, transporting goods from State to State and from foreign markets; it is the commerce, the transportation that is within the power of Congress to control, and this power can and should, as a protective and precautionary measure against wrongs daily perpetrated, be exercised at once. Every producer, every consumer, and every merchant will be benefited, thus making rates uniform and thus enable buyers to know, when they purchase a car of grain in the West, the cost of transportation to the city of New York. That such legislation in no way infringes upon the rights of the States is clear from all the authorities. Judge Cooley, in his work on Constitutional Limitations, states the question as follows:

Under the division of power between the United States and the individual States each has its sphere of sovereignty within which it moves and operates without let or hindrance from the other, and within that sphere it employs the eminent domain wherever needful to the complete and effectual exercise of its power, and with as little occasion or necessity for the permission or assistance of the other as if the two governments were wholly foreign to each other instead of being constructed as parts of one harmonious system.

The railroads and steamboats now enjoy the monopoly of the carrying trade, and there is no reason in law or morals why the same principle should not apply to one as to the other. It would not be just to control and regulate the tariff by steamboat and not by railroad. It is true that carrying by railroad has come into existence since the adoption of the Constitution, and in my judgment is subject to congressional legislation in the same manner as steamboats. It has never been doubted that the transportation of articles of trade from one State to another was and is commerce, and that the means of transportation is wholly immaterial.

In the granger cases the power of Congress to legislate upon and regulate freight and passenger tariffs is fully maintained. In one of the granger cases, Munn vs. Illinois, the court says:

In countries where the common law prevails it has been customary from time immemorial for the legislature to declare what shall be a reasonable compensation under such circumstances, or perhaps, more properly speaking, to fix a maximum beyond which any charge made would be unreasonable.

Mr. Speaker, I have thus argued and collated the authorities for the purpose of convincing this House and the country that one of our highest duties is to enact into law such rules and regulations as will prevent unjust discriminations against State, against extortion, and against all unjust combinations. All persons investing their capital in railroad property and all that deal with such corporations in any manner deal with them with this implied understanding: that the State Legislature and Congress under the Constitution may prescribe such rules and regulations as will insure justice to all the people and that the power of Congress to regulate commerce among the several States is exclusive. And the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of Gibbons vs. Ogden, and down to the last granger case reported in 4 Otto, are to be respected, and the power of the General Government will be exercised in conformity to the Constitution of the United States as construed in those cases, that, in other words, the day for unjust discriminations and extortion has passed.

Mr. Speaker, it cannot be true, in the nature of things, that the Constitution must be construed to mean only such commerce as existed at its adoption. If so, the carrying trade by the railroads of the country is beyond the power of Congress to control; the commerce carried upon these immense lines is subject only to the dictation of these monopolies. If it be true that Congress has no such power, then it seems to me that we have in vain attempted to build up a commerce for the common benefit of the people. But, Mr. Speaker, this is not the law. The Supreme Court of the United States has decided otherwise, the State courts have decided otherwise, and all men not directly interested believe otherwise. Commerce among the States, carried on by railway transportation, is subject to the control and legislation of Congress, and the language of Justice Miller, in the Clinton Bridge case, is:

It seems to me that where these roads become parts of the great highways of our Union, transporting a commerce which embraces many States, and destined as some of these roads are to become the channels through which the nations of Europe and Asia shall interchange their commodities, there can be no reason to doubt that to regulate them is to regulate commerce, both with foreign nations and among the States, and that to refuse to do this is a refusal to discharge one of the most important duties of the Federal Government.

No State, Mr. Speaker, has the power to regulate the commerce carried on between New York and Chicago, nor between Chicago and San Francisco. These lines of commerce are either beyond the control of human laws or the power of their control is vested in Congress. The provision of the Constitution applies to every means of transportation, from the dray line to railroad trains, and this has been settled time after time by the courts, the courts holding distinctly that it makes no difference whether the transportation is by land or water; and in support of this I might cite a large number of authorities, and allow me to say that upon these questions there can be but little chance for division of opinion. The purpose of this provision, as patent to all, was to vest in Congress the power to secure equality and freedom of commerce throughout the Union, without any unjust discrimination or extortion. Transportation is commerce; hence transportation among or between the States is commerce, and any obstacle to it or burden laid upon it by the States is void, and thus is created the absolute necessity of congressional action.

In the case of The Hannibal and Saint Joseph Railroad Company vs. Husen, not yet reported, the subject of the extent of the power of the State to control commerce between the States was again freely discussed. The question was as to the validity of a statute of the State of Missouri prohibiting the driving of cattle into the State of Missouri in certain months of the year, and it arose in the particular case with respect to the applicability of the statute to railroads. The court held in this case that the transportation of property from one State to another is interstate commerce, and that the statute was a direct interference with such transportation and a plain intrusion upon the exclusive domain of Congress.

Mr. Speaker, I have attempted to show that the internal commerce of the State is, and necessarily is, controlled by the State; that commerce between the States necessarily is and should be controlled by Congress; that State legislation is impossible, and the responsibility for the control of interstate commerce is with Congress.

Mr. Speaker, the advantages of railroad and water transportation cannot be overestimated. In fact, life is too short to abandon or in any manner cripple our great railway system; but while this is true, the system must not be allowed to destroy the commerce of the country or cripple the great interests of the country. This system, like all others, must submit to reasonable rules and regulations in the same manner as all other great enterprises of the country.

Mr. Speaker, I shall favor no provision of law that can tend to prejudice the railway interest of the country; but I do maintain that it is our duty to pass some reasonably stringent legislation for the protection of the people against this great system of land transportation. The bill reported from the Committee on Commerce is satisfactory to me, and I am disposed to give the bill my hearty support. It will prevent pooling; it will prevent all unjust discriminations; it will, in my judgment, prevent unreasonable charges and tend to establish uniformity of rates. I think the purpose of the bill a step in the right direction.

Mr. Speaker, it is the duty of Congress to enact such laws as will prevent any unjust discrimination or extortion in the carrying trade of the interstate commerce of the country. It does not necessarily follow that because charges are reasonable at one point and unreasonably low at another point, the discrimination may not be unjust. Take the grain trade of Illinois that is carried on by railroads leading to New York, grain merchants paying $20 per car to the New York market, which, for the purpose of this argument, may be conceded to be reasonable, and suppose that grain shippers residing in Iowa should only be charged $10 per car for a distance four hundred miles greater. This I submit would be an unjust discrimination against the State of Illinois, although the freight paid by the shippers of Illinois should be reasonable. This would give to Iowa a geographical as well as commercial advantage over Illinois shippers that would not be just. Under such a rule Illinois shippers would be unable to compete successfully with shippers residing in Iowa. We claim the geographical advantage of Illinois, and our people are compelled to sell their products in accordance with this fact. So of all the Western States. The demand is for uniform and cheap rates of transportation from the West to the East.

And can it be said that Congress has no power to prevent such discrimination? It is such discriminations throughout the country that are injuring our agricultural and commercial interests. The effect of such discrimination is the transfer by artificial means of the natural advantages possessed by one community to another less favorably situated, and to permit this is to tolerate a great wrong and subject the general interests of the country to the corporations by whose actions this unnatural effect is produced.

My purpose, Mr. Speaker, is to prevent, if possible, by legislation every combination tending to prejudice the shipper or the producer. It is my purpose, if possible, to prevent combination against ice in winter or free sailing in summer. We all know that the old idea of competition is a delusion. We all know that every tariff established between the East and the West is the result of combination, and that competition has little or nothing to do with the question. The people of the West have been greatly wronged by this system of arranging the tariff of both passenger and freight traffic. We prefer fair rates, controlled by law and uniform in their operation, to the tender mercies of these monopolies as administered by these corporations for the last twenty years.

Mr. Speaker, what the people of the West demand, and what we have a plain right to demand under the Constitution, is reasonable legislation, and such as will protect the producers and manufacturers of the West against wrong, extortion, or unjust discrimination against them. We want uniformity of rates between the East and West, and that these shall not be unreasonable rates at any time or under any circumstances.

The competing force of the interstate commerce of the country is not sufficient to overcome combination; it never has been sufficient in this country to prevent it, and never will be, in my judgment. Every rate or tariff that is fixed by these railways is the result of combination. If competition for a time is successful at a competing point, it is only temporary, and is, in fact, a discrimination against some other point. The only legitimate competition we have is the transportation by water, and nothing short of stern, legal rules, fairly enforced, will regulate and preserve fairly and justly the internal State commerce of this country. What remedy have we of the West to regulate or fix the tariff of a railroad company leading from Chicago to New York? Certainly none after it leaves the State save by congressional action.

We have in the State of Illinois fifty-one railroad companies with a total line of 15,241 miles, 7,433 miles of which are in the State, computing double track and siding of all the companies as a continuous line of 17,890 miles of single track. These companies have 3,319 locomotives, of all classes; and 1,449 passenger cars; 608 express, mail, and baggage cars; 43,076 box and stock cars; and 20,162 coal and flat cars, making a total of 65,295 cars of all classes. In addition, the American Express Company performs service on twenty-four of these roads, the United States Express Company on thirteen, and the Adams Express Company on twelve; and in some instances two companies perform service on the same road. The distance run by trains upon these roads last year was 75,567,712 miles. The proportion of mileage for Illinois was 21,925,552 miles, and carried 26,875,136 tons of freight, with 7,429,417 tons, as the proportion for Illinois. It will be noticed that only a little over one-fourth of the tonnage of these railroads is carried in Illinois. The total number of passengers carried was 20,394,027. I have no estimate by which I can give the proportionate number of passengers carried upon these roads in Illinois, but I presume that perhaps somewhere between one-third and one-fourth of the passengers carried were carried in that State.

These companies are constantly engaged in interstate commerce. I apprehend that a loaded train could not be sent out without taking goods destined for some other State, nor does a train run into Chicago or any station without taking goods from some other State. As we have seen, this is all interstate commerce, and no State under our Constitution can regulate it. I have given these items that all may understand the necessity of legislation by Congress on this subject, and when I add to this, as I have before said, that in the Union we have 77,470 miles of road being constantly operated and daily engaged in interstate commerce we can see the magnitude of the interstate commerce of this country and the necessity for legislation regulating it.

Mr. Speaker, our foreign trade must necessarily depend largely on our interstate commerce. I give the following table showing that the balance of trade in merchandise is now in our favor, but to show that this has not been uniformly the case I give the years for twenty years, including both merchandise and specie. And what we want, if possible, is to change the balance of specie in our favor. It can be done, and one of the things necessary to bring this about is to maintain steadily the balance of trade in our favor. The table shows that we have been compelled to export specie every year:

Mr. Speaker, I give the foregoing table for the purpose of insisting that in time, with fair and just rates, from the interior to the seaboard, we can gradually and certainly, in my judgment, increase our exports and reduce our imports, and thereby cast the balance of trade largely in our favor. All the products of the country not demanded for local use should find a market in our foreign commerce. It is the duty of Congress to foster in every way our interstate and foreign commerce. Our ability to produce is great, and every effort should be made to encourage both our interstate and foreign commerce. We can best do this by legal rules that shall be understood by producers, shippers, and railroad companies alike, prohibiting drawbacks and rebates, giving equal advantages to all shippers with uniform rates. Producers and middle-men can know with reasonable certainty when and where to ship and when and where to make investments, and thus reduce the margin between the producer in Illinois and the consumer in New York or New England and the producer in New England or New York and the consumer in Illinois.

The difference between the price of a bushel of corn in Bloomington, Illinois, and the seaboard is of itself an argument that every farmer and producer in Illinois can understand, and the difference between the price of a pound of beef in a New England manufacturing town and an Illinois feed-lot can be fully understood by the mechanics and laboring-men of the East; it needs no argument to teach these facts, and the excessive rates charged must be paid by the producer or the consumer. The only hope of the people of the West against monopolies in the carrying trade is in congressional action. It is the only hope in law and in fact, and if Congress shall refuse to act longer the lingering hope of justice to the people that are toiling for themselves on Mondays, Wednesdays, and Fridays, and for the railroad companies on Tuesdays, Thursdays, and Saturdays will be blotted out; or, in other words, it costs now as much substantially to get a bushel of corn to market as it does to produce it. It does not quite reach this point to-day, but it is too much. Corn can be delivered in New York from any part of the State of Illinois for eight cents per bushel at present prices of labor and railway property, and give a fair profit to the carrier.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the provision of the Constitution concerning interstate commerce does not and will not execute itself. Congress must act. Congress must come to the rescue of our interstate commerce and throw around it the protecting shield of the Constitution and thus protect the people against all combinations that may tend to injure the interstate commerce of the country. The people of the West are in good faith pressing this matter to the attention of Congress and the country. The people in the West cannot concentrate their products at competitive points, in case advantageous contracts could be made at such points, but necessity compels them to stop at the nearest station. The people feel as if they are helpless to these wrongs against them, hence there is a prevailing feeling against the railroads that should not and would not exist if the railroad companies would deal fairly with the people. Moderate rates will increase the commerce of the country, create a friendly feeling, give more men work and better pay, and tend largely to the happiness of the whole people. I think, Mr. Speaker, one of the great mistakes of the railroad companies was their assumption that they were not subject to State or national legislation. This assumption makes congressional action absolutely necessary.

Mr. Speaker, the people of the West have but little sympathy for or with railroad corporations or stockholders of such companies, and the reason is plain and the fault is with the corporations, and not with the people. The people have been robbed by men engaged in building railroads of the bonds of almost every municipality in the country, by the frauds of adventurers, and as the bonds are now being paid, the people feel that the stock they received was a fraud, and that the money was not properly appropriated; and as the bonds of the companies mature and the holders of bonds take charge of the roads, their agents, representing the bondholders, put on a degree of importance that the people, who have been wronged, are unprepared to appreciate. They ride on railroads only as a matter of necessity and ship under compulsion. There is no disposition on the part of the people under these circumstances to encourage the commerce of the country, either State or interstate.

The managers of these corporations that control the commerce between the East and West held a meeting at the Grand Pacific Hotel in Chicago a very few days ago. The purpose of this meeting, as I gather it from the newspapers, was to fix the rates of tariff between the East and West, and for a division of the spoils for the next three months between the various companies. It is this regulation by the railroad managers that the people object to. What the people demand is the right on the part of the public to fix these regulations, as they may lawfully do, in such manner as to insure at least substantial justice for all. The bill reported by the Committee on Commerce will aid in this direction greatly, and I hope it will be enacted into law.

Mr. Speaker, the question of the control of our interstate commerce will be an important factor in American politics until it shall be determined by Congress to enact such laws as will equalize the tariff on these great public highways. There is and can be no doubt of the power to regulate it between the States, and that this power is exclusively in Congress. The people understand this as well as we, and almost the universal opinion of the people is in harmony with the rulings of the Supreme Court of the United States on this subject. The people understand that the question has been settled and its settlement reaffirmed by the courts time and again. And the court understands it to be settled and so state in Groves vs. Slaughter, 15 Peters, 449. The court, after referring to Gibbons vs. Case, 9 Wheaton, 1, and Brown vs. Maryland, 12 Wheaton, 438, say:

If these decisions are not to be taken as the established construction of this clause of the Constitution I know of none which are not yet open to doubt, nor can there be any adjudications of this court which must be considered as authoritative upon any question if these are not to be so on this.

This power given to Congress by the Constitution to regulate commerce among the States has been deemed exclusive by the courts and by the people, and necessarily so from the very nature and objects of the power, and this is the doctrine of all the courts and the politics of the people. Against this regulation, I have no doubt, will be arrayed the associated wealth of these corporations, and every effort possible will be made to prevent legislation upon this subject, and when and wherever practicable men will be elected to Congress for the express purpose of defeating legislation of this kind, and railroad officers and railroad attorneys will be found in Congress elected expressly to defeat legislation by Congress on this subject.

Mr. Speaker, the agriculturist, the manufacturer, the mechanic, the laborer are all alike interested in this question. Until we have legislation upon this question capitalists, ever jealous, will not invest in business in any town where there is the slightest opportunity for discrimination.

Mr. Speaker, an equalized and just tariff of rates, uniform in its operation, will insure an increase in our interstate commerce, and will thus be one of the means of restoring to prosperity all the business interests of the country.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. Mr. Speaker, I shall make no apology for occupying the time of the House in the further discussion of the bill now under consideration. I feel constrained to reply to the attack which was made by the gentleman from Maine [Mr. POWERS] upon the report of the committee which I had the honor to submit in this case.

I would not do justice to the committee, to myself, to the House, to the country, or to the old soldiers if I should remain silent and not lay bare the gross errors of facts and expose the sophistry of the arguments which have been made by the enemies of this measure.

The House will bear witness that this discussion has not been of my seeking; I would have gladly avoided it if I could, but the gentleman from Maine [Mr. POWERS] has forced it on me and I shall meet him boldly and will demonstrate the correctness of the conclusions of the committee to the satisfaction of all who will do me the honor to hear my remarks.

On the 4th day of January, 1877, I had the honor to present to the House a similar bill tendering a nation's gratitude to its old defenders, when I took occasion to submit an argument favoring its passage which has not been answered by any gentleman upon this floor. That argument I shall not now repeat. I shall confine my remarks strictly in answer to the arguments of the gentlemen who have opposed the bill.

The objections of the gentleman from Maine and the gentleman from New Jersey were but the repetition of those which were made by the enemies of the pension acts of 1832 and 1871. These gentlemen have opposed this measure because, they say, it will establish a dangerous precedent. The enemies of the act of 1832 opposed that beneficent measure upon the same ground. The gentleman from Maine said that the bill opened up a new and wide door; that it was a departure from the old beaten path. This has been the cry of the enemies of the old soldiers against every pension act passed or proposed in Congress. I give to them the answer which was given by Foot and Frelinghuysen to Hayne, which New England gave to South Carolina in 1832; which Atkins and others gave to the enemies of the pension bill in 1858. It embraces no new principle; it establishes no new precedent; it opens no new door. The principle was established in 1818, extended in 1832, confirmed in 1871, and reaffirmed by the present Congress.

There is no principle or policy more firmly established by the Congress of the United States than that of extending the nation's bounty and gratitude by the way of pensions to its old defenders, and it is now too firmly rooted in the minds and hearts of the American people to be eradicated even by the eloquence of the gentleman from Maine, with all the aid his amiable friend from New Jersey may be able to give him. The military-pension system was adopted many years ago by our Government, and from then till now it has been steadily and constantly sustained by the people. There is no tax they pay with more cheerfulness than that which is applied to the maintenance of the old soldiers.

The first gratuitous-pension act was passed in 1818, only three years after the close of the war of 1812, when the country was heavily burdened with the debts of two wars. This act was passed thirty-five years after the close of the revolutionary war. The beneficiaries under it were sixty years of age. The Black Hawk war was forty-six years ago, and the survivors of that war are over seventy years of age. The Creek war was forty-two years ago, and the survivors are nearly seventy years of age. Forty years have come and gone since the Florida war, and the survivors must be over sixty-five years of age. The war with Mexico was thirty-one years ago, and the surviving soldiers are fifty-six years of age. The soldiers included in this bill will average over sixty-five years of age. The revolutionary soldiers covered by the act of 1818 were about sixty years of age. The act of 1818 was a gratuitous pension, so is the measure now under consideration. But suppose, Mr. Speaker, that the soldiers of the revolutionary war were seventy years of age before they were pensioned, does it follow that the soldiers of the Mexican war should wait until they are seventy before the Government recognizes its obligations to them for their heroic services in its defense? The revolutionary war was fought on our soil; the Mexican war was upon foreign soil and in a malarious climate. All citizens able to bear arms were engaged in the struggle for our independence and were exposed to its dangers and suffered its privations. If the act granting a pension to them had been passed at an earlier day the soldiers themselves would have been compelled to pay the greater portion of the money necessary to meet its demands. To have pensioned them at an earlier day would have been to tax themselves. While the Mexican war was in progress millions of our countrymen knew nothing of its perils, felt none of its privations, endured none of its toils, and saw none of its horrors. A few of our fellow-countrymen bore them all, for the good of all.

But the gentleman from Maine and the gentleman from New Jersey say that the act of 1818 restricted the pension to persons in need of assistance from the Government for a support. That is true. But I ask the gentlemen here and now, do they propose a pauper soldier roll? Will they vote for a measure which would require proof not only of an honorable service, but of poverty, to entitle the soldier to a pension? Do they propose to require the old soldier, "the country's stay in day and hour of danger," to produce the evidence of his poverty in order to receive that which is adjudged to be due him for his patriotic service? Sir, the people of this country long since compelled Congress to repeal this disgraceful restriction in the act of 1818, and thereby wipe out what I consider and what this country conceived to be a blot upon our beneficent pension system. I call the attention of the House and especially the gentleman from New Jersey to the able and eloquent remarks of a late Senator from his own State (Mr. Frelinghuysen) made in the Senate of the United States in 1832 in the advocacy of the repeal of this odious restriction in the act of 1818:

But there were two defects in the system even as thus liberalized. In the first place, it enacted the humiliating confession of absolute poverty; it required of the aged veteran that he should publicly, in the presence of the sons by the side of whose fathers he had fought and suffered, expose the wretchedness of his condition; that he should produce the proof of his pauperism and swear to it himself. I have seen these wretched in our public courts of justice exhibit an inventory of their poverty down to the items of cups and saucers. I have felt humbled for my country. Sir, a noble spirit would sometimes exclaim: "I would die in want first." If my country exacts such ignoble conditions let her withhold the miserable pittance. And who, sir, of this Senate does not honor this sentiment? It has been honored and vindicated by the manly feelings of this great community. Public opinion would no longer brook such terms of national honor and gratitude, and by the concurring indications of legislatures and people we are invoked to release these hard conditions; and should a few partake of a favor that do not need it, better so than that even one deserving relic of times so dearly cherished should go down to the dust neglected and forgotten.

Such, Mr. Speaker, were the sentiments of New England in the better days of the Republic, and such are the sentiments of the American people to-day. I do not believe that any considerable number of the people of New Jersey and Maine to-day indorse the sentiments of their Representatives upon this floor who have favored a pauper-soldier pension-roll. I rebel for them the sentiments uttered by the gentleman from Maine and his friend from New Jersey. Nor do I believe that the people of New England are opposed to this bill. She has ever been the champion of the soldier's interest, both in this House and in the Senate. All our pension acts have been advocated by her Representatives; all have received their support. New England may be said to be the originator of our pension system. Nor can I believe, Mr. Speaker, what Hayne charged, that she favored this system for the purpose of an excuse for a high tariff for the protection of her manufacturing interests, and that she now proposes to go back upon her own work because that necessity no longer exists. Nor can I believe what Hayne charged in the debate of 1832, that New England advocated that pension act because her people would receive the larger portion of the pension, and that she opposes this measure because the West and South will be the greater beneficiaries, notwithstanding the gentleman from Maine took occasion to inform the House that the South was much more interested in this bill than his section. I believe that Foot, Frelinghuysen, Webster, and other representatives from New England advocated and voted for the pension acts of 1818 and 1832 from patriotic considerations, and not from any local or selfish purpose; and I cannot believe that the gentlemen from New England who have opposed this measure represent the sentiments of their constituents. But, Mr. Speaker, the House and country have been told that the acts of 1818 and 1832 were enacted to pay a debt to the soldiers of the revolutionary war. If so, why were they called pension acts? But the advocates of the measure argued that the country was indebted to those soldiers, and therefore, say the gentlemen, the act was passed, not as a pension act, but in the nature of an appropriation for the payment of their claims against the Government. The men who advocated the passage of the act to pension the survivors of the war of 1812, in the House in 1858, argued that the country owed these soldiers a debt, and that it should pay it to them. The distinguished gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. ATKINS,] in discussing the bill in the House, said:

Gentlemen talk about this bill as a bounty, as a gift. We do not come as supplicants to this House; we do not ask it as a bounty; we demand it as a debt due to those brave old men for heroic service. Will any gentleman say that the debt has been discharged? Has $5 per month and one hundred and sixty acres of wild land compensated them for the labors of the camp, the toils of the march, and the dangers of the field? Do you count as nothing the sacrifices they made, the leaving home with the thousand charms that cluster around it, the parting from wife, children, friends—all to brave the bloody terrors of the battle-field? Sir, it was not money; a higher, nobler sentiment controlled their action and animated their hearts—their love of country.

All of them were ready to make the great offering of their life upon the altar of their country's honor. Thousands fell, and their funeral dirge is now chanted as peans to the nation's glory, and shall their surviving comrades be less fortunate? Shall they linger out in obscurity and poverty the evening of a life the morning of which was illustrated by deeds of such noble daring? Will not the country wake to the high sense of the moral obligation and legal right which demands of it to protect these old men, now that many of them are unable to protect themselves?

Mr. Speaker, these were noble sentiments, worthy of the representative of the American people, and I commend them to the serious consideration of the members of this House.

Mr. Choate, of Massachusetts, speaking of the nature of a gratuitous pension, said:

I still think the pension we now bestow, and which this bill [act of 1832] proposes to bestow, are to be regarded rather in the light of compensation for services than as alms to the most meritorious poverty. Perhaps they partake of a mixed character. To some of those to whom we give them they are given merely in charity; to others of these greatest number they are nothing less than a long-deferred and inadequate wages of such service as no money could have compensated.

This, Mr. Speaker, is the true basis upon which our pension system rests; that the service of the soldier is such that no money could ever compensate, and that as his services were of such great value it becomes the imperative duty of the Government to take care of him in his old age. These soldiers, in a high and refined equity, are the creditors of the country. But that the acts of 1818 and 1832 were in a legal sense an appropriation to meet a claim which the old soldiers of the revolutionary war had against the Government for the depreciated currency in which they were paid, I must emphatically deny. All these claims for wages during that war had been paid. They had no legal demand whatever against the Government further than all her soldiers when old have on account of the nature of the services. And, fortunately for me and the House, the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MCGOWAN] has furnished an authority sustaining this view of the subject, and I thank the gentleman for his kindness and generosity.

Some time [said Mr. MCGOWAN] subsequent to 1859 a case was heard by the United States Court of Claims involving this question. The opinion of the court, as delivered by Judge Loring, is so brief that I will read it:

"It is claimed by the petitioner that James Hooker, by complying with the requirements as to reduced circumstances, specified in the act of the 18th of May, 1818, acquired a vested right in the pension which it gave, which could not be divested without his consent by the subsequent act of the 1st of May, 1822. The act of May 18, 1818, was not a contract for the particular evidence it specified. The pension it granted rested on no legal obligation, and was in fulfillment of none. It was a voluntary offering of a grateful country, and therefore the country might proscribe or modify its terms and determine its continuance. While it continued it was an annual gift to a certain class of persons."

This case decides that the act of 1818 rested on no legal obligation. If the Government was legally indebted to these soldiers, the pensions granted them did rest upon a legal obligation. It was, however, like the act of 1871, a voluntary offering of a grateful country to the men who had rendered such service as no money could compensate.

In vain were the efforts of the gentlemen from Maine and New Jersey to draw any distinction between the principle of the acts of 1818 and 1832 and the one now under consideration. They were both gratuitous pension acts, and established the principle upon which this bill is predicated, which principle has been approved by Madison, Monroe, John Quincy Adams, Jackson, Grant, and Hayes. And I repeat that this bill does not open any new door, nor does it establish any new principle. It proposes to extend the principle which has been established for over half a century to the soldiers of the wars named in the bill. It proposes to do exact justice to all our old soldiers, making no invidious distinctions between them. Have the soldiers of the Mexican war no claims upon the Government? Did they not in the hour of their country's need, and at her call, leave brother and sister, father and mother, wife and children, with the thousand charms that cluster around them, and march to a far-off land, unacclimated, in a malarious climate, where suffocating heat oppressed the frame, and there endure without a murmur or complaint the toils of the march, the privations of the camp, and the horrors of the hospital, and bravely bear themselves amid the dangers and perils of the battle-fields, and by their unparalleled prowess and gallantry acquire 937,875 square miles of territory of incalculable wealth, which opened up an overland highway to the Pacific Ocean by which the wealth and commerce of China and Japan are poured into our lap? And did not their gallant deeds at Resaca de la Palma, Buena Vista, Chapultepec, Cerro Gordo, and Molino del Rey reflect a blaze of imperishable glory upon the American name? Do gentlemen say that the country is under no obligation to the brave men who under Scott and Taylor marched through intolerable suffering and unparalleled dangers to the City of Mexico and there conquered and scattered to the four winds an army of five times their number?

Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Maine intimated, when he addressed the House upon this bill, that all this magnificent territory acquired from Mexico was by virtue of several millions of dollars paid out of the National Treasury, thereby robbing the veterans of the Mexican war of the honor and glory of its acquisition. This, Mr. Speaker, "was the most unkindest cut of all." He not only refuses to vote them a pittance in recognition of their glorious and invaluable services, but he actually would snatch from them, if in his power, the honor and glory of having given the country, by their gallantry, California and New Mexico. Sir, I have read, I know not now where, of a stern old Englishman who, when the treaty was concluded between France and England at the peace of Amiens, disapproved of its terms as ignominious to England, and in the House of Commons said that if "King William could know the terms of the treaty he would turn over in his grave." Sir, if Scott and Taylor could have heard the gentleman from Maine when he attributed the acquisition of this territory to a few millions of dollars paid out of the National Treasury, they, too, would have turned over in their coffins. Why, sir, Clay, Yell, Butler, McKee, Hardin, Ringgold, Page, McIntosh, Graham, Ritchie, Walker, Grant, Ayres, Armstrong, Merrill, Gillespie, Allen, Benjamin, Smith, Morange, and thousands of others as brave and as good, but whose names do not appear upon the pages of history, but whose glorious deeds are enshrined in the hearts of the American people, gave freely their lives for its acquisition; the blood of these heroic men, together with the indescribable sufferings of the surviving soldiers of that war, were the incalculable price paid for this territory. This country owes them a debt of gratitude which it can never pay, and now when they come in their old age and many of them in actual want, and request a pittance for the "evening of a life, the morning of which was illustrated by deeds of noble daring" in their country's service, gentlemen upon this floor, Representatives of the American people, say to them, "We know you have been faithful and brave soldiers, and that the country is under obligations to you which it can never repay, but you must wait until more of you are dead, and then we will vote you a pension."

This, Mr. Speaker, is adding insult to injury. But, say the gentlemen from Maine, New Jersey, and New York, [Mr. TOWNSEND,] "the country is in debt and the condition of the Treasury is such that the amount of money which will be required to meet the pensions provided for under this bill cannot be spared." They tell us that when the acts of 1818 and 1832 were passed the country was out of debt. Why, Mr. Speaker, those very measures were opposed for the same reasons given by the gentlemen who oppose this bill.

The enemies of these measures said the country was in debt and could not afford to be generous until it had discharged its legal obligations. It is but the repetition of the objections which the enemies of our old soldiers have presented against every pension bill which has been presented to Congress in their behalf. Was the country out of debt in 1818? No. Do gentlemen forget that at that time the debts of two wars remained unpaid? Was it out of debt in 1832? No. Do not gentlemen remember that it was during that year that

Mr. Clay's pet measure for the distribution of the proceeds from the sales of the public lands passed, and that one of the reasons given by President Jackson in his able veto message for not approving the bill was that the proceeds from the sale of the lands had been pledged for the payment of the old revolutionary debt, and that that debt had not been paid?

Do not gentlemen also remember that Mr. Hayne and other opponents of the act of 1832 said that the country was largely in debt and could not afford to pay the pensions proposed by the bill? The same cry was made by the enemies of the act which passed the House in 1858, granting pensions to surviving soldiers of the war of 1812. The same arguments were made against it in the Senate, and, with the help of an extravagant estimate made by the then Commissioner of Pensions, claiming that the act would require $30,000,000, it was defeated. I repeat, Mr. Speaker, that this objection has been urged against every pension act which has ever been passed or proposed in Congress. I meet the argument as the friends of the acts of 1812, 1832, and 1858 met it then: "When did any great measure intended to benefit the country or mankind originate that did not cost money? Will the young men of the country complain? No; they are all full of patriotic fire." Did these brave old veterans stop to count the cost when their country summoned them to bear its flag against a foreign enemy on foreign soil? Did they stop to count the cost when they rallied around Scott and Taylor upon the bloody fields of Mexico? The question as to the cost is wholly unimportant. The question, and the only question, is, "Is it right? Is it just? Is it humane? Is it magnanimous, and is it grateful?" Bring any charge you will against the Government. Say it is parsimonious; say it is false, unjust, oppressive; but do not subject her to the charge of ingratitude—"the foulest whelp of sin!"

The gentleman from Maine tauntingly asks this side of the House if this bill was in the line of retrenchment. I answer him it is not an unnecessary and extravagant expenditure of the public funds. The democratic party is in favor of rigid economy in the administration of Government in all its departments. It favors the lopping off of every expenditure not absolutely necessary for an efficient and economical administration of the Government. It proposes to relieve the country from its present distress and depression by cutting down expenditures; by amending the revenue laws so as to compel property and capital to bear their just proportion of the burdens of government; by giving free coinage of the silver dollar; and by repealing the resumption act, so as to prevent Sherman from adding to the distress by his ruinous policy of contraction. Will the gentleman from Maine and his party friends join us in this good work? I will go with him who goes farthest on this line. I will vote to-day to cut down all salaries 10 per cent., or more if need be, to relieve my distressed country; but I shall never refuse to do an act of justice to the men who in the hour of danger defended the honor and glory of my country under the pretended plea of economy. This country is not able, says the gentleman from New York, now to pension these old soldiers. But, Mr. Speaker, she is able to spend millions of dollars to beautify and adorn this Capitol and this city. She has millions of dollars to appropriate in the erection of public buildings in the different States, for the purpose of giving employment to men who have no claims upon the Government, and for the advancement of the political fortunes of the members who procure it. By combinations here millions of dollars will be wasted upon public buildings. There are millions of dollars for the improvement of rivers and harbors for the promotion of your commerce, but not one single cent for the brave men who opened up the Pacific Ocean to your commerce. There are many millions for Pacific railroads, but not a dollar to the brave men whose sufferings and valor conquered and gave you the country for your roads. But, Mr. Speaker, lest some gentleman should be deterred from voting for this measure on account of the $7,000,000 which the gentleman from Maine has said it will cost, I shall proceed to show that the figures presented by the gentleman are wholly incorrect and unreliable. He estimates the survivors of the Mexican war at 45,600. He asserts that the whole number of deaths in Mexico of the volunteer Army was 7,088, as shown by the report of the Adjutant-General of the Army; and while holding in his hand the report from which he read I called his attention to the fact that the report stated upon its face that the loss would far exceed the number as given in the tables, owing to the number of missing rolls which could not be had.

The figures—

Said Mr. POWERS—

I rely upon the official report which he [the Adjutant-General] made after having taken time to insure that the report should be full and correct.

Mr. HEWITT, of Alabama. The gentleman will find that the number of killed and died of diseases in the Mexican war will far exceed the number given.

Mr. POWERS. I have found nothing of that kind. I have read his statement very carefully. I have here the statement of the Adjutant-General where he says he has complete information upon the subject. I have found nothing that induces me to believe there is an error here.

The gentleman, holding this very report in his hand and reading therefrom, tells the House and country that the report is full and complete. He gave the whole number who died of the volunteer Army in Mexico at 7,088, and said that he knew whereof he spoke because he had read the report carefully, and found nothing to induce him to believe that the losses were greater than given in the report. The gentleman, not intentionally, of course, deceived the House and the country. The report which I hold in my hand, being the very report from which he read, page 4, reads as follows:

It is proper, also, to state that the discharges on account of disease or disability, and the number of ordinary deaths reported to the Adjutant-General's office, and exhibited in the table, must be much less than the actual loss, owing to the missing muster-rolls and returns, which could never be obtained although repeatedly written for to commanders of regiments and corps.

And again, in a note at the bottom of page 7 of the report is the following language:

The number of ordinary deaths, discharges, &c., exhibited in the statement (C) must be considerable under the actual loss, owing to the missing muster-rolls, which could never be obtained from some of the regiments, and from which alone the necessary information could be derived.

Here we have the most emphatic statements that the actual loss was much greater than given in the table, and that the roll of some of the regiments could not be had, from which alone the necessary information could be obtained. How the gentleman from Maine fell into this gross error I cannot understand, unless he failed to read the report for himself and relied upon the statement of the Commissioner of Pensions. The gentleman from Maine again, relying on the unofficial report of the Commissioner of Pensions, gotten up for a purpose (and given not under the obligation of the oath of office,) asserts that only five hundred and twenty-five of the soldiers of the Mexican war have been pensioned as invalids. Here, again, the gentleman fell into an error which was calculated to mislead the House.

The only official report as to the number who have been pensioned as invalids, which I have been able to find, is in the report of the Commissioner of Pensions for the year 1871, where the number is stated not at 6,525, but at 11,306. I prefer to rely upon this report, made under the sanction of an official oath, when no purpose was to be served save the interest of the country, than upon the unofficial verbal statement furnished to a member of Congress for the purpose of defeating a measure obnoxious to the extreme loyal sentiments of the Commissioner of Pensions. If the gentleman from Maine was seeking for information upon this subject, why did he not go to the official documents? Why seek the Commissioner of Pensions, the known enemy of this measure, and why take his statement, unsupported by the record, for the purpose of proving that his colleagues on the committee had, either through ignorance or design, misstated the facts, thereby deceiving the House?

Why did he not call the attention of the committee to the mistake, if he believed they had made such, and give them an opportunity to correct it? Did he desire to expose his colleagues upon the committee to the House and the country as ignorant and unworthy of trust?

If he had come to the committee and asked upon what authority they had stated the number of invalid pensions to be eleven thousand, he would have been informed that it was from official documents. The Commissioner of Pensions, in this case, is convicted of having given to a member of Congress false information, contradicting the official documents in his own office, and, according to the well-known rules of law, his statement, being false in one particular, cannot be relied on in any other.

The gentleman from Maine based all his calculations and estimates upon information informally and unofficially received from the Commissioner of Pensions, and, it having been shown clearly that in one particular this information is false, the whole fabric and superstructure erected thereon must crumble and fall.

The gentleman from Maine has asserted that the losses of the volunteer Army in Mexico did not exceed 7,088. I have shown that they were much greater from the official documents. The gentleman said that the report of the Adjutant-General had been carefully read by him, and was full and complete, and covered all the losses in Mexico. I have shown from the very report which he asserted he had read very carefully that the report was not complete and did not give all the losses in said war.

The gentleman from Maine, upon the authority of the Commissioner of Pensions, told the House and country that only 6,255 of the Mexican soldiers had been pensioned as invalids. I have shown from the official documents that the number was 11,308.

The gentleman from Maine has told the House, and the press has wafted it all over this country, and it has been reasserted time and again here in this House by the enemies of the old soldiers, that over forty-five thousand of the men who fought the battles of Mexico thirty-one years ago still survive and that it will require seven millions per annum to cover the expenditures of this measure.

Mr. Speaker, I propose to show that the gentleman's calculations are wholly unreliable; in fact, I have already shown that the figures upon which he has based his calculations in part are not in fact true, and his whole calculations must therefore necessarily be false and totally unreliable. Is there a man in this House who believes that over forty-five thousand of the men who went out to Mexico are alive to-day? Have gentlemen forgotten the horrible history of that war? Have gentlemen forgotten that it was fought on a foreign soil, in a malarious climate, under a tropical sun? Have gentlemen forgotten the sad news wafted upon the wings of every western breeze, while our little Army was in Mexico, of the sufferings of the soldiers and of the thousands who perished? No army ever suffered as ours in Mexico. Thousands perished there, and many more died on their way home, or in a short time after reaching home. Many died in New Orleans after they were discharged, and all came home with the seeds of disease in their systems, with their health and constitutions more or less shattered and impaired by exposure incident to all wars, but more especially to the war in Mexico.

And, sir, it should be considered that this country, since their return home, has been cursed with a bloody and devastating fraternal strife, in which many of these old soldiers perished.

I submit, Mr. Speaker, that the Carlisle tables prepared for life insurance, where all who are diseased or whose families were subject to certain hereditary diseases are excluded and where none but the robust and the sound in mind and body are included, are not applicable to these old soldiers, and calculations based upon these tables are deceptive and unreliable.

How many of the volunteer Army survive to-day who are included in this bill? There were in round numbers 73,000 enlistments. The committee estimate that there were at least 13,221 re-enlistments, that is, that number who, after the expiration of their term of service re-enlisted and of course are duplicated on the rolls. This estimate is not questioned by any one. There were, as shown by the report of the Adjutant-General, 7,088 deaths in Mexico, but he adds that the loss would far exceed this number owing to a number of missing rolls from some of the regiments. What that number was he does not tell us, nor is there any official documents anywhere where it can be had.

But the returns from some of the regiments appear to be full and complete. Colonel Collins's Illinois regiment, Colonel Cheatham's Tennessee regiment, Colonel Seymour's Georgia battalion, and the Palmetto regiment are among the number which seem to have made full returns.

Now, it is reasonable to suppose that other regiments, in all things similarly situated and alike exposed, would have sustained as great a loss as these regiments.

Now, as the reports are not in full as to all of these regiments, and the number lost in Mexico cannot be ascertained by any official documents, and being compelled to resort to some other source for this information, I submit to the House if an estimate of the whole loss of the volunteer Army based upon the losses of the regiments named in which their losses are ascertained from official documents, is not a fair way to approximate the number.

Now, these regiments were twelve months' men, and of course it would not be fair to estimate the losses of those who served but three months by them. I therefore exclude the three months' men altogether from my calculation.

There were 12,610 held for three months, which, deducted from 73,000, leaves 60,390, who served for twelve months.

Colonel Collins's regiment of 1,000 men lost 237.

Colonel Cheatham's regiment of 1,000 men lost 210.

Palmetto regiment of 1,000 men lost 405.

Colonel Seymour's battalion of 403 men lost 184.

Total number of men in these regiments in Mexico, 3,403; total loss 1,036.

The loss of these regiments in Mexico was about one third of their number. The whole number of troops in the volunteer Army for twelve months, 60,390, one-third of which is 20,130, which number, under this calculation, represents the loss by deaths in the volunteer Army in Mexico.

There is still another way by which we may estimate the loss of the volunteer Army.

The reports of the losses in the regular Army are full and complete. Now, why would not an estimate based upon the known losses in this line of the service be a fair and legitimate mode by which to ascertain the loss of the volunteer Army?

It is a known fact, and, for reasons which suggest themselves to every gentleman acquainted with war and the Army, that our volunteers suffered far more than the regular troops, and that the mortality among the former is far in excess of the latter. Then there ought not to be any objection by the enemies of this bill to an estimate based upon the losses of the regular Army. There were engaged first and last during the war in the regular service in round numbers 27,000 troops. This arm of the service lost in Mexico by death and desertion, according to the official documents which I have in my possession, 8,667.

Now, if 27,000 give 8,667 what will 73,000 give? The problem is solved by the single rule of three. The solution gives us as the losses by death and desertion 27,578 of the volunteer Army. But, lest gentlemen object to this upon the ground that the regular troops served longer in Mexico than the volunteers, I will take what is known as the new establishment of the regular troops, as their service in Mexico was but little longer than the volunteer soldiers.

The new establishment numbered in round numbers 11,000 men. Their loss by deaths was 2,264. The same calculations will give the loss of the volunteer Army at 15,024 from deaths. These calculations of the losses are in excess of the estimates of your committee, and I submit to the House and the country if they are not fair and legitimate. The first estimate based upon losses of certain regiments gave the loss by deaths at 20,130; re-enlistments, 13,231; the number not serving sixty days—which is not questioned—4,709; number of desertions, as shown by the report of the Adjutant-General, heretofore mentioned, 3,876; pensioned as invalids, say 8,000; total, 49,946. This number, 49,946, deducted from the whole number of enlistments, will give the number of survivors thirty-one years ago who would have been entitled to pensions under this bill; the number of enlistments at 73,000; deduct therefrom 49,946 leaves 23,054.

Now, the gentleman from Maine tells us that the Carlisle tables say that 31 per cent. will die between twenty-five years of age and fifty-six years of age.

Now, if that be the percentage of persons in good health and with robust constitutions, what will be the percentage of persons whose constitutions were impaired and whose health was shattered by exposure in Mexico, and who have passed through another bloody war? Would it be at all unreasonable to estimate that 50 per cent. have died? I submit to the House and the country that, in my judgment, more than 50 per cent. have been taken off. If we deduct 50 per cent. from 23,054 the remainder is 11,527. This is the number of survivors of the volunteer Army.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the statistics of the Pension Office show that one-third entitled to pensions never make application therefor. There must therefore be a further reduction of one-third, in order to arrive at the number who will receive pensions under this bill.

This deduction will give 7,685 who would receive pensions. But if we take the estimate based on the losses from deaths and desertions from the regular Army, new establishment, the number who would be entitled to pensions would be 7,120. Have I not made a fair estimate?

These calculations and figures are in excess of the estimates given by the old soldiers themselves. They are in excess of the estimates of men who have been for years striving to ascertain, by actual count, the number of survivors. The National Association of Veterans of Mexico, with State associations in almost every State in the Union, has been for years, in conjunction with the State associations, endeavoring to ascertain the number of survivors. They have advertised in almost every newspaper in the United States, inviting the survivors to send up their names; and as an inducement they have been promised a medal of honor, and they have been told that Congress was about to give them a pension.

After extraordinary exertions upon the part of these associations the number, including the regular Army, invalid pensioners, and those who served less than sixty days, which has been reported, is only about eight thousand. General Morgan, of Ohio, himself an old veteran of the Mexican war, wrote, two years ago or more, to his comrades in arms in Ohio, that, after the maturest reflection, it was his opinion that less than six thousand of the men who served with him in Mexico then survived. The Illinois Association of Veterans of Mexico, after six years of extraordinary exertion, with the assistance of all the press of the State, have only found, residing in said State, five hundred and fifty-three of these old soldiers, which is less than 10 per cent. of the number of troops who were in the Mexican war from Illinois.

There is no doubt, Mr. Speaker, that I have overestimated the number of survivors. How many of twenty-seven thousand who were in the regular Army survive to-day? The official reports are full and complete as to this arm of the service. The loss by deaths and desertions in Mexico were 8,667. The number pensioned as invalids was 3,263. It must be considered that these soldiers were not discharged at the close of the war. Their term of service was five years, and I submit that it is not unreasonable to suppose that they continued in the service two years and a half, upon an average, after the close of the war. How many would have died and deserted during that time?

In 1848 that dread pestilence, the Asiatic cholera, broke out among the troops in Texas, and many perished. I do not think it at all unreasonable to estimate that at least twenty-five hundred died or perished before their term of service expired. These must all be deducted from the number serving in Mexico.

First. The number of deaths and desertions in Mexico, 8,667.

Second. The number heretofore pensioned as invalids, 3,261.

Third. The number dying and deserting after the close of the war prior to their discharge, 2,500.

Total, 14,425.

This number deducted from 27,000, the number in Mexico, will leave 12,572. Now, for the same reason, I deducted 50 per cent. from the surviving soldiers in the volunteer army as would likely die in thirty-one years. I subtract 50 per cent. from 12,572, who were honorably discharged from the service thirty years ago. That will give as the survivors of the regular Army, 6,286. Now deduct one-third of the number entitled to pensions, who never apply therefor, will give 4,199 who will receive a pension under this bill. The whole number, instead of reaching the figures given by the gentleman from Maine, 45,000, will only be 11,875.

This brings us to the Indian wars named in the bill. I will first show that the gentleman from Maine has not given us the correct figures as to the number of soldiers employed in these wars. The Commissioner of Pensions again misled the gentleman and caused him to give as facts and figures to this House that which the official documents, easily accessible to Hon. J. A. Bentley, do not sustain. And I must be permitted here to remark that if the Commissioner of Pensions will hereafter give more of his attention to the legitimate business of his office than in giving false information, whether ignorantly or intentionally, to certain members of Congress in his inexcusable effort to defeat this measure, it will be far better for the country and the poor pensioners who are under his care.

The Commissioner of Pensions and the gentleman from Maine say that there were in the Black Hawk war 5,031 men. The official report of this war, made by Major-General Macomb, says:

Instructions were sent to General Atkinson, authorizing him to call on the governor of Illinois for such militia force as would, with the regular troops under his command, enable him to act efficiently.

Accordingly 3,000 mounted volunteers were ordered into the field by the governor. The campaign was opened on the 18th of June, 1832, with these troops and about 400 regulars.

There were near 1,100 other regular troops ordered to take part in this war under General Scott, but the Asiatic cholera broke out among them and they never reached the seat of war and never took any part in it. The whole number, therefore, was not 5,031, but 3,400 as shown by the official report of Major-General Macomb.

This was forty-six years ago. The average age of volunteer soldiers who took part in this war must have been thirty or thirty-five years, as they were generally men of families. They must now be at least seventy-five years of age, and there cannot now be surviving a greater number than is given by your committee; that is, 200.

The gentleman from Maine also says that there were in the Seminole war 5,911 troops. I have not examined the official reports to see whether this be true or not. That war is not included in the bill, and I cannot see why it was lugged into this debate. That war was in 1818, and most of the troops engaged in it were in the war of 1812, and were pensioned as such.

The gentleman from Maine, relying upon this information received from the Commissioner of Pensions, told the House that there were in the Creek war 13,418 troops.

There, again, he has been led into a mistake. The official documents do not sustain, but contradict this statement.

The number engaged was as follows: Regular troops, 1,500; militia, including friendly Creek Indians, 1,500 strong, 9,000; making 10,500, instead of 13,418 as asserted by the gentleman from Maine.

The official document from which I took these figures also shows that when General Jesup had subdued the Creek Indians the regular troops, 1,500 men, and the Tennessee brigade, 1,500 strong, were ordered into Florida, and that the others were disbanded.

Why did not the gentleman from Maine tell the House of these facts, or why did not Mr. Bentley, who is so anxious to keep that side of the House informed as to the facts of this case, inform his friend from Maine of them, so that he might have given them to the House?

The gentleman was certainly desirous of giving the House and country all the material information necessary to form a correct idea as to the number of survivors of these wars, and these were facts easily accessible to the gentleman from Maine or his friend, Mr. Bentley, and they were facts essential to know in order to form a correct conclusion as to the number engaged in these wars and as to the number who would likely receive a pension under this bill.

I cast no reflection upon the gentleman from Maine. I know him too well to believe that he would intentionally state anything here or elsewhere calculated to deceive; but I do reflect upon Mr. Bentley, who has gone out of his way from the legitimate duties of his office to give information to the enemies of this measure, which information in many particulars is false, and in others he has concealed material facts which he ought to have known and which should have been stated.

The regular troops, 1,500, and the Tennessee volunteers, 1,500 in number, which went into Florida and which are estimated in the number of troops in the Florida war, together with 1,500 Creek Indians, making in all 4,500, must be deducted from the 10,500, which will leave 6,000 instead of 13,418, as stated by the Commissioner of Pensions. A large proportion of this 6,000 did not serve thirty days, and of course will not be entitled to a pension. There were a large number enlisted who never reached the seat of war. There were fully half of the 6,000, I am satisfied, who were not in the service for thirty days, and will not be entitled to a pension. The number surviving can be but few, and they will average over seventy years of age, for it is a well-known fact that men who served in that war were men of families, and must have been upon an average of at least thirty years of age, which would now make them upon an average of seventy-two years of age.

This brings us to the Florida war.

Here again the gentleman from Maine has been misled by Mr. Bentley. He says there were engaged in the war 41,112 troops.

Where did Mr. Bentley obtain this information? I only know that if he had examined the report of one of his predecessors, made in 1871, he would have found that the number was given at 29,953. And I feel perfectly satisfied after examining the official reports of this war, that the number above given is largely in excess of the actual number enrolled.

It is utterly impossible to arrive at the exact numbers employed, from the official reports, but enough is given to enable us to approximate the correct numbers. The official reports show that the number of militia in Florida in 1836 was 1,800 and that the number of regular troops was 1,996. That in 1837 there were in the aggregate, militia, 4,078; regulars, 4,633; seamen, 100; Indians, 178. That in 1838 there were 355 militia and 3,088 regulars. That in 1839 there were 793 militia and 2,321 regulars. That in 1840 there were 250 militia and 2,722 regulars. That in 1841 there were about 100 militia and 2,722 regulars. That in 1842, the year the war closed, there were no militia employed, and there were only 1,300 regulars.

These figures are taken from the official reports, which show the number in November of each year. The number of militia, according to these reports, in Florida during said war was 7,406 and the number of regular troops 19,692; in all, 27,098; which number is less than the number given by the report of the Commissioner of Pensions in 1871 by over two thousand.

This calculation, it will be seen, includes the number of troops employed in each year during the war.

Now, the regular Army term of service was for three years, so that I may reasonably suppose that two-thirds of the regular Army are counted twice in this calculation.

The whole number of the regular Army employed during the said war was, as I have shown, 19,692, one-third of which is 6,564, which, added to the number of militia employed, will give 13,610 as the whole number of troops engaged in said war.

How many of these can now survive? They will average over sixty-five years of age. There has not been a single deduction in this calculation for desertion or death in the service. The troops in Florida suffered severely and many of them died. Can there now survive exceeding two thousand of these men? That is a liberal estimate. The survivors of the Creek war will not exceed 500; survivors of the Black Hawk war, 200; Florida war, 2,000—total, 2,700. Now deduct 33 per cent., who do not make application, and the remainder will be the number in the Indian wars who will receive pensions under this bill, which is 1,800. The number of sailors who now survive will not exceed 500, included in this bill.

Let us recapitulate: Number of survivors volunteer Army in Mexico, 7,685; number of survivors of the regular Army in Mexico, 4,190; number of survivors in the Indian wars, 1,800; number of sailors, 500—total, 14,175.

These will be entitled to $8 per month, or $96 per annum; which will give $1,360,100 per annum. I have given you figures from official documents where they could be had. The calculations which I have made I do not pretend to say are altogether correct, but I do say they approximate the true number, and I believe the number of survivors will fall below my estimates. I have not gone to the Commissioner of Pensions for information; I have shown his statements and figures are not reliable. All the official documents which he could have been accessible to me in the Library of the House, and I have drawn from them.

I come now, Mr. Speaker, to the third objection; that is, that this bill is a departure from other pension bills, inasmuch as it proposes to pension soldiers of Indian wars. The gentleman from Maine and the gentleman from New Jersey both have said that the soldiers of the Indian wars have never been pensioned. The soldiers of the revolutionary war frequently fought the Indians. I remember reading recently the description of a battle between our troops under General Wayne and the Creek Indians, near Savannah, Georgia, during that war. The writer described it as one of the hardest-fought battles of the revolutionary war. These men were pensioned.

Who has not read with pride the history of the battle of the Horse Shoe, between the Creeks upon one side and our troops under Jackson on the other? There was fought neither upon the Gulf nor upon the lakes any battle during the war of 1812 more hotly contested or where our troops displayed greater prowess than at the Horse Shoe. Were not the soldiers who fought that battle as justly entitled to the gratitude and bounty of the country as the troops who fought the British, either at New Orleans or Plattsburgh? There is no just man who would not say they were, and the country has so thought, and has extended to them the same pension which it has given to the soldier who met the British.

Thus, while it may be true that the Government has not granted a pension to the soldiers of the Indian wars, it is not true that it never has granted pensions to soldiers who have fought the Indians.

The war against the Indians, in which our troops were engaged under Wayne, shortly after the close of the revolutionary war, was fought mostly by soldiers of the revolutionary war, and who were pensioned as such. The troops of the Seminole war of 1817 were soldiers who had been engaged in the war of 1812, and have been pensioned as such. There has been no other Indian war between 1817 and 1832 that assumed the proportions of a war.

The Government does not propose to pension the pioneer who pushed his way into the Indian country and there provoked hostilities in his own wrong, in which a few settlers are engaged, without a declaration of war and against the consent and approval of the Government, nor does the Government propose to pension the militia called out by governors of States, who were never in the service of the Federal Government; but when the country is involved in a regular war with the Indians and calls for volunteers, there is no good reason why any distinction should be made in the bestowal of the nation's bounty between them and any other soldiers of the country. Will the gentleman from Maine or the gentleman from New Jersey give a reason why it should be done?

The Florida war, Mr. Speaker, was one of flagrant and cruel aggression upon the part of the Seminoles. The cause which led to it I shall not stop to recount. There never was a more treacherous, ferocious, and cold-blooded origin to any war in the annals of the world. The bloody and savage history of its origin I shall not stop to repeat. The House and the country are familiar with its fiendish details. There never was a war which required an exhibition of all the soldierly requirements to a greater extent. Their courage and discipline were exhibited against perils and toils which subjected courage and discipline to the severest test.

While this war was in progress, Mr. Benton, of the Senate of the United States, said:

And has there been any failure of patience, fortitude, courage, discipline, and subordination in all this war? Where is the instance of an order disobeyed, ranks broken, or confusion of corps? On the contrary, we have constantly seen the steadiness and the discipline of the parade maintained under every danger and in the presence of massacre itself. Officers and men have fought it out where they were told to fight. They have been killed in the tracks where they were told to stand. None of those pitiable scenes, of which all our Indian wars have shown some—those harrowing scenes in which the helpless prisoner or the helpless fugitive is massacred without pity and without resistance—none of these have been seen. Many have perished, but it was the death of the combatant in arms, and not of the captive or the fugitive. In no one of our savage wars have our troops so stood together and conquered together and died together as they have done in this one, and in this standing together is the soldier's character. Steadiness, subordination, courage, discipline, these are the tests of the soldier, and in no instance have our troops or any troops ever evinced the possession of these qualities in a higher degree than during the campaigns in Florida. . . . Courage and discipline have shown themselves throughout all its stages in their noblest forms. . . . The theater of war is of great extent, stretching over six parallels of latitude, all of it in the sultry regions below 31° of north latitude. The extremity of this peninsula approaches the tropic of Capricorn, and at this moment while we speak here the soldiers under arms at midday there will cast no shadow; a vertical sun darts its fiery rays direct upon the crown of his head; suffocating heat oppresses the frame; annoying insects sting the body; burning sands, a spongy morass, and sharp-cutting saw-grass receive the feet and legs; disease follows the summer's exertions, and a dense foliage covers the foe. The Secretary of War, in an official document, which may be found in the House library, said: "Several instances have occurred during the war with the Seminoles, in which our troops have nobly sustained the honor of the American name, and those who will dispassionately consider the events of the past year will find in the services of the Army many strong claims on the confidence and gratitude of the nation."

They were compelled to move their forces with the utmost caution in the face of a bold, active, and wily foe thoroughly acquainted with the passes of rivers and morasses which intersect the country and who hovered around their flanks, concentrating their numbers upon a point of attack with unexampled rapidity and flying from the open ground with a swiftness that baffled the pursuit of the white man. When it is considered that these difficulties had to be encountered and surmounted by raw, undisciplined troops in the face of an active enemy that destroyed unseen, delivering a deadly fire at an unexpected moment and disappearing in morasses impenetrable to the eye of the white man, the zeal and persevering courage of our officers and men are worthy of all praise.

Such is the testimony to the courage and valor of our soldiers in the Florida war, by the Secretary of War, and Thomas H. Benton, United States Senator from Missouri. The official reports are full of the highest commendations of our officers and men for their gallantry and endurance in this war. Tell me why there should be any distinction drawn between these soldiers and those of any other war? The service in which these soldiers were engaged was as dangerous and as arduous as that of any service to which our soldiers have been subjected. We have received from their services value far in excess of any compensation we propose by this bill. They conquered the Creeks and Seminoles, which gave us Alabama and Florida, and which removed these Indians west of the Mississippi, where, ever since, they have been at peace with us. Why do we give pensions at all? It is on account of the hazards encountered by the soldiers and the benefits which have resulted from these hazards to the country. It is on account of the nature of the service. If it is right to give pensions to the soldiers who encounter civilized men, it is surely equally right to give them to the soldiers who meet the savage in war. The gentleman from Maine quoted from the speech of the present Secretary of the Treasury delivered in the Senate of the United States when the pension act of 1871 was under consideration. I shall recall his witness to the stand for cross-examination. When in 1858 a bill was pending in the House to grant pensions to the soldiers of the war of 1812, John Sherman, then a member of the House from Ohio, not only advocated the passage of a bill to pension the soldiers of the war of 1812, but he absolutely advocated a measure to pension soldiers of Indian wars. This witness was called by the gentleman from Maine to prove that our soldiers should not be granted gratuitous pensions until they were eighty years of age; but his witness upon cross-examination has shown that he voted such pension to soldiers who did not average more than sixty-five years of age, and not only that, but to soldiers of Indian wars.

I regret exceedingly, Mr. Speaker, that the gentleman from Vermont, [Mr. JOYCE,] the gentleman from Michigan, [Mr. MCGOWAN,] and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HAYES] have seen proper to revive unpleasant memories of the late fraternal strife. Why should this bill be enlisted in the ungracious service of rekindling sectional hatred and tearing open old wounds well-nigh healed? I had fondly hoped that all would follow the patriotic and generous example of the gentleman from Maine [Mr. POWERS] and the gentleman from New Jersey, [Mr. SINICKSON,] and recognize alike the service of the brave men of the North and South who suffered and fought together under Scott and Taylor in Mexico. There were no sectional animosities then among them, and I thank God there is none among them to-day. There is not an old veteran at the North, republican or democrat, who would have his comrades at the South excluded from the provisions of this bill. I have had many letters from all parts of the North and West, from these old veterans, all condemning the effort to exclude their southern comrades from the benefits of the bill. I hold in my hand the memorial of the First Illinois Association of Veterans of Mexico, in which these words are found:

We cannot ask you to grant a pension unless the bill is broad enough to embrace all who served in the Mexican war, and through whose services the United States is the greatest and richest nation in the civilized world. We desire and hope that sectional feeling will be cast aside in your action on this question. President Washington said in his retirement: "Sincerely hoping that the bonds of our Union may be strengthened by wise and just enactments, ours will indeed be a union of hearts and hands which no foreign foe can break."

This is but the sentiment which animates the hearts of all the veterans of the Mexican war. Sir, I firmly believe they would spurn your offered bounty if their southern comrades are not to participate in it with them. They were all the soldiers of the Union. They were all brave defenders of one common country. They alike suffered for a common cause. There were no "traitors" among them. There were no "rebels" in the American Army in Mexico. They were all patriots, faithful and true to their country. The atrocious crime of rebel and traitor charged against me and others in this House by the gentlemen from Vermont, Michigan, and Maine I shall neither attempt to palliate nor deny, but will let the country determine from our course here as Representatives as to whether or not these gentlemen are truer to the Constitution and the best interest of the people than those whom they denounce as criminals. By their works men prove their faith; by their fruits men are known. I do not propose, Mr. Speaker, to discuss with these gentlemen dead issues which ought not and which cannot be resurrected. Let the dead past bury its dead. The present and the future alone concern our country. To them alone the statesman should give his attention. I, too, have decided opinions as to the causes which led to the late unhappy civil strife, and as to the manner in which the war was conducted upon either side, and as to the guilt or innocence of the actors therein; but these opinions are not important to the country, nor would they serve to illuminate or illustrate the subject under consideration. I shall leave my action in the late war to the impartial historian, when passions shall have subsided and reason shall assume her way; and in whatever position I may be assigned for my participation in what you term the rebellion, whether traitor or patriot, I shall be satisfied. I shall patiently await the impartial judgment of posterity, firmly believing, whatever its judgment may be as to the wisdom of my course, I shall be acquitted of all crime.

If, Mr. Speaker, I were disposed to revive unpleasant memories of the unhappy past, I could remind the gentleman from Vermont of some dark spots in the history of the State he has the honor in part to represent. Her history is not without spot or blemish. But I take no pleasure in exposing the dark spots on the escutcheons of my country nor any of her daughters. I would rather, like the sons of Noah, cover her nakedness with a garment and hide it from the gaze of a vulgar and sensual populace. The gentlemen say that treason must be made odious, and the enormity of the crime of rebellion must be forever kept before the people; that the law must forever remind the southern people that they were rebels and traitors. Is this the sentiment which animates the republican party? I cannot and will not believe it. Sir, I will let Charles Sumner answer the gentlemen for me:

It is contrary to the usages of civilized nations to perpetuate the memory of civil war.

Hear, also, what a distinguished member of the republican party and now in the Cabinet of your President said, and I commend the sentiments to the members of this House as worthy of all acceptance:

No civilized nations, from the republics of antiquity down to our days, ever thought it wise or patriotic to preserve in conspicuous and durable form the mementos of victories won over fellow-citizens in civil war. Why not? Because every citizen should feel himself with all others as the child of a common country and not as a defeated foe. All civilized governments of our days have instinctively followed the same dictates of wisdom and patriotism. The Irishman when fighting for old England at Waterloo was not to behold on the red cross floating above him the name of the Boyne. The Scotch Highlander when standing in the trenches at Sebastopol was not by the colors of his regiment to be reminded of Culloden. No French soldier at Austerlitz or Solferino had to read upon the tricolor any reminiscence of the Vendée. No Hungarian at Sadowa was taunted by any Austrian banner with the surrender of Villagos. No German regiment from Saxony to Hanover charging under the iron hail of Gravelotte was made to remember by words written upon the Prussian standard that the black eagle had conquered them at Königgrätz. Should the son of South Carolina, when at some future day defending the Republic against some foreign foe, be reminded by an inscription on the colors floating over him that under this flag the gun was fired that killed his father at Gettysburg? Should this great and enlightened Republic, proud of standing in the front of human progress, be less wise, less large-hearted than the ancients were two thousand years ago and the kingly governments of Europe are to-day? Let the colors of the army under which the sons of the States are to meet and mingle in common patriotism speak of nothing but union—not a union of conquerors and conquered, but a union which is the mother of all, equally tender to all, knowing of nothing but equality, peace, and love among her children.

Such were the noble sentiments of Carl Schurz and Charles Sumner, and are to-day the sentiments which animate the hearts of a large majority of the American people. What no civilized nation from the ancient republics down to our day has ever done, the gentleman from Vermont, [Mr. JOYCE,] the gentleman from Michigan, [Mr. McGOWAN,] and the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. HAYES,] would have this enlightened and Christian Republic do. These gentlemen will never be able to induce the American people to adopt measures which have been condemned by the concurrent action of every civilized nation on earth as unwise and unpatriotic.

The gentleman from Vermont [Mr. JOYCE] and the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. McGOWAN] oppose this bill, among other grounds, because it proposes to restore to the pension-rolls certain invalid pensioners who had been dropped therefrom on account of disloyalty. Now, both of these gentlemen admit that if the invalid pension is in the nature of a contract and is a vested right, then, under the general pardon and amnesty proclamation of the President of December, 1868, all invalid pensioners are entitled to their pensions and should be restored to the rolls.

The only question, therefore, at issue between these gentlemen, and the committee as to this point is as to the nature of the invalid pensions. I hold, and the committee held, that an invalid pension is a vested right which the Government has no legal right to take away from the pensioner without his consent. That the Government had a right under the war-making power, from public policy, to suspend the payment of pensions to persons residing in the belligerent States during the late war, I have no doubt, for otherwise it might have been forced to contribute money to the enemy who carried on the war against it; but that it has any legal right, when the war is over and such a creditor becomes a citizen of the country, with all the rights and privileges of any other citizen, to refuse to pay the claim, I most emphatically deny. That it might do so, I admit, but such a refusal would be nothing less than downright repudiation.

Is an invalid pension in the nature of a contract? In the early days of our Government an act was passed which enacted that if any officer or private in the regular service, while in the service of the country, be disabled, from wounds or otherwise, in the line of duty, such officer or private soldier so disabled should be entitled to a pension; and if such officer or private in the line of duty should be killed, his widow or minor children should also be entitled to pension. This has been substantially the law ever since.

When the country was involved in the war of 1812, the act authorizing the President to call for volunteers enacted that all who volunteered in said service, if disabled by wounds or otherwise, should have a pension. The same promise, by authority of law, was made to those who volunteered in the Mexican war. When President Lincoln issued his proclamation in 1861, calling for seventy-five thousand troops to suppress the rebellion, he promised that if any so volunteering should be disabled in the service, they should have a pension; and when Congress afterward met, it passed an act ratifying and confirming the promise thus made by Mr. Lincoln.

Every soldier who volunteered in the war of '61 did so under a law which promised him a pension upon his disabilities incurred in the line of duty. So also every soldier who volunteered for service in the Mexican war did so under a law which made him a solemn pledge that if killed in the line of duty his widow or minor children should be pensioned; or, if he should be disabled in the line of duty, that on his return to his home he should be taken care of by the Government.

The pension is offered as an inducement to the soldiers to enter the service, and it is a part of the consideration for the service to be rendered. The country is in war. It is sorely in need of soldiers; it goes to the poor man, with a wife and houseful of children who depend upon him for their daily bread; it says to him: "Your country needs your services in the field; go join the Army, and you shall have $8 a month to feed your wife and children." "But," says the man, "the service is hazardous and dangerous. If I should lose my life or be disabled, who is to feed and care for those dear ones?" The country says "Go, and if killed, they shall be the wards of the nation, a grateful country will take care of them; and if you are disabled in the line of duty, when you return to your home you shall receive a pension to support you and your family." The soldier accepts the terms, bids his dear ones farewell, and obeys the call of his country, and subsequently, in some bloody charge upon the enemy's line, he is pierced by a ball and falls—

With his back to the field and feet to the foe,
And leaving in battle no blot on his name,
Looks proudly to heaven from the death-bed of fame.

He expires with full faith that the country for which he gave his life would be true to its promise to him, and would tenderly care for his wife and dear little ones.

The gentleman from Vermont and the gentleman from Michigan say the country is under no legal obligation to take care of that soldier's wife and minor children. Sir, this is far more than any ordinary debt: it is a debt of the highest honor, and which could not be refused without the blackest national dishonor. The law has made this promise to every soldier who has been in the Army since 1812.

The condition upon which the pension is predicated is the soldier's disability in the service in the line of duty, and upon the happening of which the pension becomes a vested right. There can be no doubt upon this question, if a government can bind itself by any contract. Is the Government bound by its own laws having the attributes of a contract? Grotius says:

A government has its affairs and interest, it deliberates and becomes a simple person having understanding and will, and is susceptible of obligations and laws. Kent says:

A law embodying a contract duly passed and promulgated thenceforward becomes the law of the land, and it is as binding upon Congress as on any other branch of the Government, or as a contract would be binding upon the Government executed under the authority of law.

In 1780 the Continental Congress passed an act promising to the military officers who would remain in the Army until the close of the war a pension or half pay for life. This was a promise in the nature of a pension upon certain conditions—that is, the service during the war. This promise was made after the officers had enlisted, and was no part of the consideration of enlistment, and is therefore not as strong a case as that of the invalid pension.

Washington, speaking of the nature of this promise, said:

It was part of their hire. I may be allowed to say it was the price of their blood and of your independence. It is therefore more than a common debt; it is a debt of honor; it can never be considered as a gratuity, nor canceled until it is fairly discharged.

The committee, Mr. Speaker, in support of their view of the nature of the invalid pension, quoted from the decision of William Wirt, when Attorney-General, in 1825, concerning a pension claim of a widow under the invalid-pension law. The gentleman from Michigan said that the Attorney-General did not mean to say that the pension was property, but all that he intended to say was that the widow had a right to apply for her pension. I do not know by what process the gentleman from Michigan has been able to discover that the Attorney-General meant to say something which he did not say, nor do I understand how the gentleman has discovered that the Attorney-General meant to say that which he did not say. Now, the gentleman says that there can be no such thing as a vested right to an invalid pension. William Wirt, who was one of the ablest lawyers which this or any other country has ever produced, in 1825 said:

Here is a certain right which, the law says, shall accrue to the widow upon the happening of a certain event—that of her husband having died by reason of a wound in the line of duty. The law does not require that either an application should be made by her, or that anything else should be done in order to consummate her right. It is consummated by the mere death of her husband under circumstances already mentioned. It is a vested right to so much money per annum for five years, subject, however, to be discontinued or defeated by her death or remarriage, but a vested and perfect right during the time she continues to live the widow of her deceased husband.

The gentleman from Michigan says it is not a vested right; but Wirt said it was not only a vested but a perfect right to the pension—not, as the gentleman says, a right to apply for the pension, but that the pension, or the promise made by the Government to the husband, became a vested and perfect right upon his death. This language is too plain for construction. Either Wirt was wrong or the gentleman from Michigan is wrong. Again, said Wirt:

It is in the nature of an absolute engagement or promise made by the Government to those officers and men that, if they fell in the service of their country, so much shall be paid to their widows and children.

What is an absolute engagement or promise but a contract? Will the gentleman from Michigan tell me what Wirt meant by this language?

Again he said:

It is bottomed only on this single condition—that the husband and father shall die in the service of his country, on the happening of which condition the public engagement becomes a debt, which is as much property of the widow and children as any bond which the deceased husband may have left them by his will.

What is that which becomes the debt? It is not the remedy given by law to recover the pension, but is contract made by the Government to the deceased soldier. It is not the right of the widow to apply for a pension, for the Attorney-General said it is a vested and perfect right, and is her property, whether she applies for it or not. This decision is conclusive upon the subject and cannot be construed away.

The gentleman from Michigan quotes from a decision of Judge Loring, of the Court of Claims, in a case arising under the act of 1818. That decision has no application whatever to the question at issue between the gentleman from Michigan and the committee. That decision was made under what is known as the gratuitous pension act, and not an invalid pension at all. The committee have nowhere claimed that a gratuitous pension was a vested right, and that the Government was under any legal obligation to give it, or continue it when given. It is no part of the contract, but is a mere matter of grace. Hence the decision to which the gentleman referred as an authority does not sustain him, for it does not involve the question at issue at all.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I have shown both by reason and authorities that the invalid pension is a vested and perfect right, and that it is property. Now was this right forfeited by the pensioners adhering to the Confederate States during the late war? This question I will let the report, which I had the honor to submit in this case, answer:

No such view is supported by the law. The law forbids the payment of the pension without proof of loyalty, but does not declare the right of pension forfeited. The abandoned and captured property act forbids the payment of the proceeds of the sale of such property without proof of loyalty. The Government became the trustee of the claimant of such proceeds, and upon proof of loyalty restored the same to him. So, in the case of the pension, it is not declared forfeited, but is held by the Government in trust, to be restored on proof of loyalty.

There was but one description of property during the late war which was forfeited without a proper proceeding and judgment of a court of competent jurisdiction, and that was the property of the Confederate States, or property employed in actual hostility on land. Chief Justice Chase, in Klein's case, 13 Wall., 136, says:

"The property of the insurgent States may be distributed into four classes:

"First. That which belonged to the hostile organization or was employed in actual hostility on land.

"Second. That which at sea became lawful subject of capture and prize.

"Third. That which became the subject of confiscation.

"Fourth. A peculiar description, known only in the recent war, called captured and abandoned property.

"Almost all property of the people in the insurgent States was included in the third description. But it will be observed that tribunals and proceedings have been provided by which alone such property could be condemned and without which it remained unaffected. It is thus seen that, except property used in actual hostility, no titles were divested in the insurgent States unless in pursuance of a judgment rendered after legal proceedings."

The right of invalid soldiers to pensions has been shown to be a perfect vested right, and could only have been forfeited by the judgment of a court of competent jurisdiction in a proper proceeding therein. But, in addition to this, they are covered by the general pardon and amnesty of 1868.

What was the effect of this pardon so far as it related to them? It released them not only from all penalties incurred by reason of their "participation in the rebellion against the authority of the United States," but it absolutely and forever "blotted out," "obliterated," and effaced the offense itself, and made them, in contemplation of law, wholly "innocent" and loyal citizens. It supplies the proof of loyalty in all proceedings where such proof is required. It forever closes the eyes of all tribunals to the perception of the fact that they had "participated in the rebellion against the authority of the United States" as an element in the judgment in any proceeding for or against them. It renders section 4716 inoperative so far as it affects them. The effect of the general pardon of 1868 is no longer an open question. It has been settled in a number of cases by the Supreme Court of the United States. In the case of ex parte Garland, 4 Wall., 361, the court said:

"A pardon reaches both the punishment prescribed for the offense and the guilt of the offender, and when the pardon is full it releases the punishment and blots out of existence the guilt, so that in the eye of the law the offender is as innocent as if he had never committed the offense."

The committee refer to the case of Padelford against the United States, 9 Wall., 531.

The appellant was at the commencement of the war a citizen of the State of Georgia, and with most of the citizens of the South aided in its struggle for a separate existence. He subsequently availed himself of the pardon of December, 1863, by taking the oath and afterward observing the same. After the close of the war he brought suit in the Court of Claims to recover the proceeds of certain cotton captured by the Federal forces during the war. This suit was brought under the captured and abandoned property act. This act required the claimant to prove affirmatively that he did not give aid and comfort to the confederate cause. The court held that the pardon "purged him of whatever offense he had committed against the United States," and no offense connected with the rebellion "could be imputed to him," and that it "relieved him of whatever penalty he had incurred by reason of his having participated in the rebellion," and that the "law made the proof of pardon a complete substitute for proof that he had given no aid or comfort to the rebellion."

In Klein's case the court said:

"That pardon includes amnesty. It blots out the offense pardoned, and removes all its penal consequences."—13 Wall., 137.

Again, in the case of Carlisle:

"It is true the pardon and amnesty do not and cannot alter the actual fact that aid and comfort were given, but they forever close the eyes of the court to the perception of that fact as an element in its judgment. There has been some difference of opinion among the members of the court as to the cases covered by the pardon of the President, but there has been none as to the effect and operation of a pardon in cases where it applies. All have agreed that the pardon not merely releases the offender from punishment for the offense, but that it obliterates in legal contemplation the offense itself."—16 Wall., 151.

The court in all these cases held that pardon not only releases the offender from punishment, but wipes out of existence the offense itself; that no offense growing out of the rebellion can be imputed to any one covered by the general pardon and amnesty of December, 1868; that a full and unconditional pardon restores to the offender his property and rights to the same extent as if he had never offended. The only limitation to the effect of a pardon as thus stated is, "it does not restore offices forfeited and property or interest vested in third persons in consequence of the conviction and judgment." And this "benign prerogative of mercy," being conferred upon the President by the Constitution, is not subject to the legislative will, nor can it be "fettered by any legislative restrictions." In Klein's case, heretofore cited, the court said:

"The President's power of pardon is not subject to legislation. Congress can neither limit the effect of his pardon nor exclude from its exercise any class of offenders."

If section 4716 be enforced against invalid pensioners, then their property is confiscated, and they are punished for their participation in the rebellion, notwithstanding their pardon. How can this be done if the law, as expounded by the Supreme Court, is to be respected and obeyed by the Executive and his subordinates?

The Supreme Court, as it has been shown, has decided that their pardon releases them from all punishment, and that no crime growing out of the rebellion can be imputed to them. Then this section necessarily comes in conflict with the effect of their pardon, and, being a restriction of the pardoning power, is null and void, so far as it affects their rights. The law says that every soldier, without a single exception, disabled by wounds or otherwise in the line of his duty shall have a pension.

Why are not all, therefore, wounded or disabled in the line of duty entitled to a pension? The only answer is that many who would be otherwise entitled to a pension engaged in the late rebellion, and section 4716 forbids the payment of any pension to them; they are therefore excluded solely on account of an offense of which they have never been adjudged guilty by any court of competent jurisdiction, and which has been pardoned in full, blotted out of existence and wholly obliterated. These soldiers thus excluded are as justly entitled to their pensions under the law as a soldier who lost a limb or an eye in the defense of the Federal Union. While the committee does not censure the Commissioner of Pensions for enforcing the provisions of section 4716, yet they feel constrained to say that he has mistaken the law, and that he could have found high authority for disregarding said section and following the law as expounded by the Supreme Court. Whenever an act of Congress is decided to be inoperative by the Supreme Court it is not only the right but the imperative duty of every executive officer to disregard it. The Commissioner of Pensions should have followed the decision of the court, holding that the pardon forever closed the eyes to the perception of the offense pardoned as an element in his judgment, and substituted the pardon for proof of loyalty.

If the Government has restored the property captured by the Federal forces to the persons from whom it was taken, by virtue of their pardon, then it should restore the pensions, the property of its old soldiers who were disabled in battle gallantly maintaining its honor and upholding its flag. The Government has not confiscated the property of any other citizens of the South; why should it continue to confiscate the property of its old defenders? While a bill was pending in this House during the forty-third Congress, amending the act to pension the surviving soldiers of the war of 1812, Mr. BUTLER, of Massachusetts, offered the following amendment thereto:

"Provided, That the restoration and pension contemplated by this act shall take effect from the passage of this act."

And upon said amendment he submitted the following remarks:

"The section to which this amendment is appended proposes to remove from the pensioners the disability imposed by the act of 1864. [The act alluded to was incorporated in the Revised Statutes as section 4716.] Now, it seems to me manifestly unjust that we should confiscate the pension during the intervening time. While the war was going on, while the Union was still unrestored, it was a very proper thing to cut off the pension of those who were disloyal, but I cannot see why the pensions of those men should be confiscated by the Government while no other property is confiscated. * * * The pension was their property, inalienable except on account of their disloyalty while that disloyalty existed and while the safety of the country required such a policy. But the time of danger is now passed, and I do not see why these old men should be deprived of their pensions while all other persons in the South are left to enjoy their property."

This patriotic speech made an impression upon the House, for Mr. BUTLER's amendment was carried by a "large majority." To refuse to restore these old soldiers to the pension-roll and to pay their pensions, on account of their "participation in the rebellion against the authority of the United States," would be a total and wanton disregard of that gracious prerogative of mercy reposed by the Constitution in the President, and a flagrant and unwarrantable violation of the Constitution itself, and a foul repudiation of the public engagement more dishonorable, if possible, than a refusal to pay the interest or principal on the bonded debt of the Republic. What would the country think if this committee should bring in a bill to repudiate the sacred obligation of the Government to the widows and orphans of the brave men who fell in the late war fighting for the perpetuity of the Federal Union? There is scarcely a man here or elsewhere in any section of our common country who would not denounce the measure as monstrous, and the members of the Committee as unfaithful servants of the American people.

The obligation of the Government to pay the invalid soldiers of the South their pensions for their disabilities incurred in its defense is as sacred and obligatory as its engagement to the widows and orphans of the soldiers who fell in the Union Army. Both have the pledged faith of the Government; if the one can be refused without dishonor, so may the other. But the committee say with emphasis that neither can be refused without a violation of a most sacred obligation, and without national perfidy. Wisdom and statesmanship alike dictate a repeal of all laws which make a difference, in the bestowal of national benefits, between fellow-citizens of one common country. How can it be expected that the southern people will love and respect this Government as they should, so long as an old soldier shows to the young men his scars and wounds received in many a hard-fought battle in defense of his country's flag, which now disowns him; and, with tears in his eyes and a sad heart tells them "These were all received in upholding my country's flag. My comrades in arms at the North, battle-scarred and wounded as I am, are all tenderly cared for by the Government, while I am left to starve or beg for sustenance because of my sympathy for my people and section in the late war." Is it right?

There can never be that unity of sentiment between the North and South in one common co-operation for the achievement of a common purpose so essential to the prosperity and glory of the country so long as the disabled soldiers of the North are pensioned, while their comrades in arms in the South, who shared with them the same toils, hardships, and dangers, wounded and disabled as they were, are refused this national bounty. Mr. Sumner well understood this when he introduced his famous resolution into the Senate of the United States to strike from the flags and Army Register the names of battles between fellow-citizens. Mr. Sumner said:

"The national unity and good-will among fellow-citizens can be assured only through an oblivion of past differences, and it is contrary to the usage of civilized nations to perpetuate the memory of civil war."

General Grant, too, well understood when, in December, 1873, he recommended to Congress a full and unconditional pardon and amnesty for all offenses growing out of the "rebellion," that a thorough and genuine national reconciliation could only come through an "oblivion of past differences." The administration of President Hayes has done much to restore confidence and rekindle the patriotic fires which once glowed with such warmth and fervor in every southern heart. Let Congress join in this good work, and "stimulate, not stifle the uprising of good feeling and affection" of the southern people for our common country. Let every trace of the civil war which is calculated to irritate our fellow-citizens in any part of the Republic, or which tends to perpetuate bitter memories of the fraternal strife, be erased and expunged from the public records of the National Government, "and the result will be peace, real and permanent peace, and a unity between the once alienated sections of the Republic"—a result which every patriot most ardently desires.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I have met the enemy, and have routed him all along the line. I have demonstrated the correctness of the conclusions to which your committee come in the report submitted with this bill. I have shown that the figures and estimates as to survivors of the war named in the bill submitted by the gentleman from Maine are not supported by, but contradicted by, the official documents, and are consequently totally unreliable. I have shown that this bill establishes no dangerous precedent; that it opens no new door; that it enacts no new principle; that it only extends the principle which was established more than fifty years ago to the soldiers named in the bill. I have shown that all these old soldiers have strong claims upon the bounty and gratitude of the country. I do not know, Mr. Speaker, what others intend to do, but I shall give this measure my hearty support, believing the whole country will sanction and approve of my action. Public opinion has decided in favor of this measure, and you cannot, you dare not, resist it. The people, before whose will we should all bow, demand this measure shall pass. Can any man doubt the fact? Look at the proceedings and instructions of State Legislatures. The states of Pennsylvania, Ohio, Illinois, Indiana, Wisconsin, Minnesota, California, Virginia, Alabama, Louisiana, Mississippi, Tennessee, and Kentucky, have all requested their Representatives to vote for this measure. There is no mistake in this. It speaks but the voice of the people, and the Representative who fails to heed it will be called before the bar of public opinion, when he returns to his constituents, to give a strict account for his refusal to obey their will. If the men who are here will not respect the wishes of their constituents, be assured that they will send Representatives who will. The servant should not be above his master. You cannot resist a measure which the people demand. There are ten or twelve thousand old soldiers, far advanced beyond the meridian of life, many of them in penury and want, who come to us as the representatives of the American people, for whom they sacrificed the morning of their life, and ask that they may be granted a small pittance to feed and clothe them for their very few remaining days. Can you refuse their request? If you do, I shall feel humbled for my country.

IMPROVEMENT OF NAVIGATION OF COOSA RIVER, ALABAMA.

Mr. LIGON. Mr. Speaker, early in the session I introduced a bill granting aid to improve the navigation of the Coosa River, in the State of Alabama. Being a local measure it is not to be presumed that the members of this body understand the real merits of the case and the necessity of the appropriation. I desire the attention of the House in presenting a few facts and arguments in favor of said bill. The Coosa River is formed by the junction of the Oostenaula and Etowah Rivers at Rome, a thriving city in the State of Georgia, a few miles from the State line of Alabama. It flows through seven of the most important counties in Alabama and a short distance above the city of Montgomery, the capital of said State, joins the Tallapoosa River, and they form the Alabama River. In these seven counties any variety of soil and production may be found; the bottom lands are unsurpassed in fertility; corn, cotton, wheat, grain of all kinds are gathered in great abundance. But the real wealth along this river is undeveloped: coal, iron, marble, and other minerals may be had near its banks in any quantity and of the best quality.

Here is a grand river, running through two States, entirely the whole length of the State of Alabama north and south, a distance of seven hundred and fifteen miles, and thence through the upper part of Georgia over one hundred miles to the Coosawattee, and navigable this entire distance for steamboats, except from Greensport to the city of Wetumpka, a distance of only one hundred and thirty-seven miles. For the greater part of this distance this river is from three to four hundred yards in width of good depth of water and the clearest and most beautiful stream of all of our southern rivers.

It is strange that this great highway from the mountains in Georgia to the Gulf at Mobile should have been so long neglected by State and Federal governments. In the year 1867 the Legislature of the State of Alabama passed an act authorizing the governor to appoint a commission to examine and survey the Coosa River from the city of Wetumpka, in said State, to the city of Rome, in Georgia. This commission was appointed and the survey made and report sent to the Legislature, but, Mr. Speaker, while this was being done a new order of things was set up in our State by the authorities at Washington City, and we entered upon that dark page of our history known as the days of reconstruction. After that we were not able to open up or improve the navigation of any river, being involved and overwhelmed with debt by those who had no interest in the future prosperity of our State. When a change of administration was finally had in our State affairs, all questions looking to the improvement of our river navigation were lost in the work to extricate ourselves from financial embarrassment to adjust and compromise the State indebtedness. And now, after years of toil and strife, and with an earnest desire to build up our languishing industries and the waste places in our land, we appeal to the Federal Government for aid to accomplish this great work. This link of one hundred and thirty-seven miles between Greensport and Wetumpka, when finished, would open up a section of country now excluded from all markets, and place it in direct communication by water with the Gulf. A section of the State supplied with timber (pine and oak of the best quality, and in quantity sufficient it is said, by the surveyor, "to furnish one hundred million of feet per annum for export for one hundred years") may well attract the attention of the Federal Government which is the owner of a vast amount of public lands situated in these counties.

Should this ever be opened, coal could be delivered at Mobile at a low figure, and sawed lumber of the finest quality would find an outlet; both these articles would then add greatly to the prosperity and wealth of the country. The population of these seven counties is now over ninety thousand, the climate is mild and salubrious, and if this river was made navigable the water-power is sufficient to run all the factories in the South; the latitude exempts it from malarial diseases of the two States of Georgia and Alabama. Far back in the interior the Government would be protected in all its works and shops and munitions of war.

The time is coming when our steamers engaged in the South American trade or with the Pacific coast will do their coaling at the Gulf ports, and the coal-fields in Alabama will be the nearest point for this supply; barges will then be loaded on the Coosa, and, drifting down the river to the Gulf, will discharge their cargoes on board of vessels in the bays of Mobile and Pensacola, and returning will bring back the products of South America and other foreign countries.

Mr. Speaker, it was some time before I could understand why the coal men in Pennsylvania could ship coal down the Ohio and Mississippi Rivers to New Orleans and undersell those who were engaged in the same business living in my own State, Alabama, although not one-fifth the distance from New Orleans; the secret was not that mining could be done any cheaper in Pennsylvania than in Alabama, for the cost is about the same, but it was in the transportation and because the bulk was not broken until it was emptied into the vessels at New Orleans. Railroads cannot compete with water carriage in the article of coal.

Mr. Speaker, in my conception the Government could not make a better investment than spending judiciously a few hundred thousand dollars in improving the navigation of the Coosa River. Had this river been in the North that energetic population, ever looking out for its own interest, would never have allowed this grand stream to remain blockaded and closed with so much undeveloped wealth bordering on its shores. Long since it would have had the General Government at work on its shoals and removing all obstructions, and boats and water-crafts would have been traversing it from its head waters to the Gulf.

From the Coosawattee, the head of navigation, one hundred miles above Rome, Georgia, to the Bay of Mobile, is eight hundred and fifteen miles, and is now navigated by steamers during nearly the entire year, except the one hundred and thirty-seven miles of river between Greensport and Wetumpka. There can be no doubt that the expenditure of money required to make this gap passable in the navigation will be more than justified by the great advantages to be had. That railroads are a great benefit to a country through which they run, affording speedy shipment of the products of one section to another, no one now questions; but it is an established fact that railroads cannot compete with water transportation, especially in heavy freights such as cotton, coal, iron, lumber, corn, wheat, and flour; all these commodities can be and are transported by canals and slack-water navigation at about one-third the cost charged by railroads. This has been demonstrated in the report of the auditor of the canal department of the State of New York to the Legislature of that State.

If canals and slack-water in northern latitudes, where they are ice-bound for nearly six months in the year, achieve such results, would it not be safe to state that a steamboat line of transportation, open every day in the year, from Rome, Georgia, to Mobile, Alabama, by river navigation, could move heavy freight at prices far below the charges made by railroad? Besides, the people would have competing lines of transportation, and each would tend to check the other in the imposition of heavy charges.

Mr. Speaker, there was an appropriation made by Congress in 1876 for the Coosa River of $30,000, of which sum there was expended in 1877 $15,732.45, leaving an unexpended balance in the Treasury of $14,267.55.

The amount recommended by the Chief Engineer for the Coosa River for the year ending July 1, 1879, is $100,000, which, with the unexpended balance in the Treasury, will be sufficient, it is thought, for making the required improvement up to that time.

When we consider, Mr. Speaker, the vast amounts of money and lands which the Federal Government has given to railroads, donating in fact vast empires of the public domain and with a lavish hand giving millions of money, is it not a little surprising that our grand rivers running through the heart of our country should be kept year after year sealed against navigation for the lack of a few hundred thousand dollars? We appeal to you gentlemen of the North and West to co-operate with us in our effort to vitalize interest which will result in great good to our common country. And the paralyzed industries of our State would gladly invite and welcome the life-giving influence of capital from your section of the Union.

Mr. HUMPHREY obtained the floor, but yielded to

Mr. BURDICK, who moved that the House adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at ten o'clock and forty-five minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

THE BANKRUPT LAW.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I move to take up the joint resolution I offered yesterday about transferring the electoral records to the Secretary of State.

Mr. McCREERY rose.

Mr. EDMUNDS. If my friend from Kentucky rises to offer a resolution, I withhold my motion.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. For what purpose does the Senator from Kentucky rise?

Mr. McCREERY. I rise to ask unanimous consent to make Senate bill No. 35 the special order for next Friday.

Mr. ALLISON. What is the bill?

Mr. McCREERY. It is the bill to repeal the bankrupt law.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I object to all special orders, I do not care what the bill is.

Mr. ALLISON. It is the bill to repeal the bankrupt law.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It ought not to be made a special order. It can be moved after we finish the railroad bill, in the regular course.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Vermont had been recognized.

Mr. McCREERY. I thought the Senator would probably give way until I could get the permission of the Senate for this purpose.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I do not agree to special orders. It must be a very extreme case, I think, to warrant making a special order. The rules require two-thirds to do so, implying that it must be an extraordinary case.

Mr. MCCREERY. This bill was introduced more than five months ago, and by this time it ought to be entitled to some consideration.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Undoubtedly it is entitled to consideration, and I assure the Senator he shall have no difficulty, so far as my voice goes, in getting it up by a motion, as soon as we dispose of this railroad affair.

Mr. MCCREERY. But if I make the motion now, will it not answer?

Mr. EDMUNDS. No; because we cannot dispose of it in the morning hour.

Mr. MCCREERY. I do not want to dispose of it in the morning hour; I want to have it taken up next Friday.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The Senator can give notice that he will move to take it up then. I presume there will be no objection to it.

Mr. MCCREERY. I give notice that I shall move to take the bill up next Friday.

RECORDS OF ELECTORAL COMMISSION.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I move to take up the joint resolution (S. R. No. 22) providing for a place of deposit for the records and proceedings of the commission appointed under the act entitled "An act to provide for and regulate the counting of votes for President and Vice-President, and the decision of questions arising thereon, for the term commencing March 4, A. D. 1877," approved January 23, 1877.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution. It directs that these records and proceedings shall be deposited by the secretary of the commission with the Secretary of State, who shall preserve them among the archives of his office.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a letter from the chief clerk of the War Department, transmitting a copy of a resolution of the General Assembly of the State of Pennsylvania in relation to the graves of soldiers of the late war interred in the cemetery at Harrisburgh, in that State; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

THOMAS J. CHOATE AND OTHERS.

Mr. PLUMB. I move to proceed to the consideration of Senate bill No. 333.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. No. 333) for the relief of Thomas J. Choate, Erastus Foster, Milton Ladd, Clarence E. Haney, William A. Hill, Kneeland F. Huckaby, and William Blackburn, late privates in Company F, Third Regiment Arkansas Cavalry Volunteers. It authorizes the Secretary of War to amend their records by causing the charge of desertion to be removed.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let us hear the report.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there any report accompanying the bill?

Mr. PLUMB. There is a written report.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It will be read.

The Secretary read the following report, submitted by Mr. PLUMB, March 19:

The Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 333) for the relief of Thomas J. Choate, Erastus Foster, Milton Ladd, Clarence E. Haney, William A. Hill, Kneeland F. Huckaby, and William Blackburn, late privates in Company F, Third Regiment Arkansas Cavalry Volunteers, have had the same under consideration, and submit the following report:

This bill proposes to relieve the persons named by removing the charge of desertion from their military records. The company of which they were members was recruited in Yell County, Arkansas, in the fall of 1863. In September, 1864, while their command was stationed at the post of Lewisburgh, information reached the men that the locality of their homes, some forty miles distant, was being overrun by detachments of rebel soldiers and guerrillas, and that their families were being cruelly plundered and outraged. In their anxiety to do something for the relief of their friends they appealed to the commanding officer of the regiment to send a scouting party for that purpose, but a sufficient force could not be spared from the post. They then appealed to the commanding officer of the company, who, with the other officers, resided in the neighborhood spoken of, for leave to be absent for a few days for the purpose of extending relief to their suffering families, or removing them to a place of safety. Verbal permission was granted to this effect, and the men were authorized to be absent a week or thereabouts.

They failed to report for duty at the time specified. It is shown that after they had left for their homes the surrounding country became thoroughly infested with rebel parties. The troops at the post of Lewisburgh were compelled to abandon that place and fall back upon Little Rock. The men who had gone to the relief of their families had frequent conflicts with the enemy, and one of their number (Blackburn) was killed, as the evidence shows, prior to the expiration of his leave. From the testimony given by the survivors, corroborated by the officers of the company so far as the facts were within their knowledge, it appears that it would not have been practicable for the men to rejoin their commands at the time specified, and that had they undertaken to do so their capture by the enemy would have been almost inevitable. The thoroughfares and the country generally were so thoroughly under the control of the rebels at the time that the men were compelled to seek shelter and safety in the secluded mountains of that region, venturing out occasionally, when opportunity served, to minister to their own necessities or the wants of their families. So completely were they cut off from communication with the Union forces it appears that for a long period they did not even know where the command was.

These men voluntarily returned to their command in January or February, 1865. They gave satisfactory explanations of their prolonged absence, and were promptly assigned to duty. They received honorable discharges when their command was mustered out of the service. They state that they were not apprised that the charge of desertion appeared against them upon the record until after the passage of the additional-bounty bill in 1866, when they made ineffectual efforts to secure a share of its benefits. Much delay ensued by reason of the difficulty in securing testimony, but at length application was made to the War Department to relieve them from their disability, which was declined upon the ground that so long a time had elapsed it would be unjust to the Government to reopen cases which had been determined at the time when all the facts and circumstances were fresh in the knowledge of the proper authorities. It appears, however, that two men of the same company, Burk Johnson and Hugh M. Barnett, were in 1875, by the War Department, relieved from the charge of desertion incurred under the same circumstances, and upon testimony substantially the same as has been presented to your committee. The fact that these men had the verbal permission of their company commander to absent themselves, the condition of that section of country at that time, and their voluntary return to duty, seem to leave no reasonable doubt that they were without the slightest intention of deserting the service. That they had the permission spoken of, is conclusively shown by the testimony of the company officers, added to their own. It appears to be clearly established, also, that these men had been and subsequently were faithful soldiers, and thoroughly loyal to the Union cause.

The committee are therefore clearly of the opinion that the persons named are entitled to the relief sought, and they recommend the passage of the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

WILLIAM L. HICKAM.

Mr. COCKRELL. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. No. 378) for the relief of William L. Hickam, of Missouri. There can be no objection to the bill when the report is read. It is a bill which passed the Senate at the last Congress.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It directs the Secretary of the Interior to cause the pension agent at Saint Joseph, Missouri, to issue and deliver to William L. Hickam a duplicate check, numbered 61872, for the sum of $1,616.33, in favor of William L. Hickam, for one lost in the mail November 30, 1876, if the Secretary of the Interior is satisfied that it has not been paid; and Hickam is to give bond, with security approved by the Secretary of the Interior, to hold the United States harmless against the payment of the original draft.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let us hear the report.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The report will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the following report, submitted by Mr. MORGAN, March 27:

The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 378) for the relief of William L. Hickam, of Missouri, have had the same under consideration and report the bill with amendments, and recommend its passage.

From the evidence before the committee, which is submitted as part of this report, and is marked Exhibits A, B, C, and D, it satisfactorily appears that the said William L. Hickam is the lawful guardian of the minor children of Hillary J. Jenkins, late private of Company A, Sixth Regiment of Missouri State Militia, who are entitled to a pension, No. 175447 on the pension-rolls.

It appears from the letter of the pension agent at Saint Joseph, Missouri, that a check was drawn by W. T. Johnson, pension agent at that place, in favor of William L. Hickam, on the assistant United States treasurer at Saint Louis, Missouri, No. 61872, dated November 30, 1876, for $1,616.33 for the first payment on said pension. It appears from the letter of A. E. Edwards, assistant treasurer of the United States, dated February 12, 1877, that check No. 61872 for $1,616.33 in favor of William L. Hickam has not been paid, and that, at his request, payment has been stopped.

It appears from the affidavit of William L. Hickam that he never received said check, and that nothing has been paid on account of the same. Under the law no duplicate check can be issued in such cases in lieu of the original where the amount is over $500. (See Revised Statutes, section 4770.)

It is therefore the duty of Congress to provide by law so that the money may be paid to the person entitled.

The bill that is herewith reported is believed to be guarded sufficiently to provide against the payment of the original draft.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Claims with amendments: in line 5, before the word "Missouri" to strike out "Saint Joseph" and insert "Saint Louis;" in line 9, after "William L. Hickam" to insert "as guardian of the minor children of Hillary J. Jenkins;" and in line 13, after the word "paid" to strike out—

And that said Hickam give bond, with security approved by the Secretary of the Interior, to hold the United States harmless against the payment of the original draft.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I should like to hear the last amendment reported again.

The CHIEF CLERK. At the end of the bill it is proposed to strike out—

And that said Hickam give bond, with security approved by the Secretary of the Interior, to hold the United States harmless against the payment of the original draft.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Why ought those words to be stricken out?

Mr. COCKRELL. For the simple reason that the draft never has been indorsed. It is payable by the subtreasury at Saint Louis, and written notice has been filed there that there has been no indorsement and no actual receipt of the draft, and payment has been stopped, and it cannot be paid at any other place. It would simply be to require the guardian of these minor children to do something that could be of no benefit whatever to the United States and no protection to it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Apparently the only evidence that this draft was not received by Hickam and indorsed by him for value is his own affidavit. That, as I understand it, is the only evidence of that fact. Of course, if it never has been indorsed by Hickam and there is any way to prevent his indorsing it hereafter, there would be no need of the bond; but as we only have to take Mr. Hickam's word for the fact that he has not already indorsed the draft or that he may not hereafter, it appears to me that the usual security that we always require in such cases ought to be given. Although he is a guardian, it is a business transaction.

Mr. COCKRELL. It is a business transaction, and the subtreasury has been notified, and that notice has been entered upon the books. I state as a proposition of law that if Mr. Hickam were, after the passage of the bill, to get his original draft and indorse it, the Government would not be liable to pay it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Why, Mr. President, if this draft was drawn by the pension agent pursuant to law, as I suppose it was, the Government would be liable as a drawer as well as an acceptor; and therefore if Mr. Hickam received the draft at the time and indorsed it for value to somebody, no matter if payment has been stopped, when the holder of that draft presents it at the Treasury and the Government will not pay it, he then has a right to have recourse to the drawer, that is to say to the United States whose authorized officer drew the draft and drew it lawfully. So then the liability of the United States, after all, would turn upon the question whether Mr. Hickam has already indorsed the draft, though perhaps as it is so old a transaction an indorsement now would throw such suspicion upon it that the Government would not be liable as the drawer. I should not think it would myself, as at present advised; but I submit to my friend that as the only evidence we have that the draft has not already been passed for value to some holder is the statement of Hickam himself, we ought to apply, although he is a guardian, the universal precaution that this bill, as my friend originally introduced it, contained. Of course I do not wish to interfere with the committee; I only make these suggestions for safety.

Mr. COCKRELL. We considered that matter at the last session of the Forty-fourth Congress, which was very soon after this occurrence. Then the committee of the Senate put on this proviso as an amendment to the House bill. We considered this year that after this great lapse of time there was no occasion for putting in the requirement of a bond at all; that these minor children had been kept out of their money for nearly a year and a half, and that they ought to have it now without these conditions.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I think this is the first instance in which we have been asked to pay lost drafts without the giving of security, no matter whether the drafts were in favor of people who were not sui juris, as the saying is, or in favor of people who were acting as trustees; and I submit to my friend from Missouri, however clear the case may seem to him—and I do not doubt it does, and I have no reason to have any suspicion about it at all—that we shall depart from a wholesome rule in these cases of giving substituted drafts if we do it without the usual security.

Mr. COCKRELL. I am not particular about the matter at all. If it were not that the facts are just as they are, we should have adhered to that bill. I introduced it myself in that form, and at the last session of the Forty-fourth Congress I reported that proviso as an amendment myself; but we thought sufficient time had elapsed to justify the passage of the bill now without throwing any impediment in the way. It is a long distance from here to Lexington, Missouri, and there may be some trouble in filling a bond that the Secretary of the Interior will accept, and I think it would be a mere matter of justice to these minor children that they should have their money speedily.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That begs the very question.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendments reported by the Committee on Claims.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I should like to have the vote on the last amendment taken separately up.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question will be put on all the amendments except the last.

The amendments were agreed to.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The last amendment will now be reported.

The CHIEF CLERK. The committee report at the end of the bill to strike out:

And that said Hickam give bond, with security approved by the Secretary of the Interior, to hold the United States harmless against the payment of the original draft.

Mr. INGALLS. If this amount were not in excess of $500, no matter at what time the draft had been issued or what period had elapsed since it was sent to the claimant, he would be obliged, in case of its non-receipt, to give an indemnifying bond such as the Secretary of the Treasury might prescribe. Section 4770 is the one that bears directly upon this subject, and it provides that—

In place of original checks issued for pensions, when lost, stolen, or destroyed, disbursing officers and agents of the United States are authorized, after the expiration of six months from the date of such checks, to issue duplicate checks, and the Treasurer, assistant treasurers, and designated depositaries of the United States are directed to pay such checks drawn in pursuance of law by such officers or agents, upon notice and proof of the loss of the original checks, under such regulations in regard to their issue and payment, and upon the execution of such bonds, with sureties, to indemnify the United States, as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe.

And as this sum is in excess of $500 it would seem as if the same rule ought to be followed as would be followed in case this had come under the section of the statute. I am inclined to think that although the case is one that presents some strong features upon the symphathies of Congress this is not an instance where we should depart from the rule laid down in the statute. I therefore hope the precedent will not be set of allowing this duplicate draft to issue without an indemnifying bond.

Mr. COCKRELL. I am certain that neither the Senator from Vermont nor the Senator from Kansas can desire more safeguards thrown around the legislation of the country than I do, and I shall make no captious effort to secure the adoption of this amendment. If the Senate think it should not be adopted they can adhere to the original bill. I have no objection to it at all, and I have consulted with the Senator who made the report and with his consent I will withdraw the proposed amendment.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the withdrawal of the amendment? The Chair hears none, and the amendment will be regarded as withdrawn.

Mr. INGALLS. If that clause is to stand requiring an indemnifying bond to be given it should be amended by requiring the instruction to be made by the Secretary of the Treasury, and not the Secretary of the Interior, as it now stands in the bill.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That puts it on the same ground that the statute does.

Mr. INGALLS. The same ground as the statute.

Mr. COCKRELL. Does the present statute require that the bond in the case of a draft under $500 shall be to the satisfaction of the Secretary of the Treasury?

Mr. INGALLS. Yes, sir.

Mr. COCKRELL. I have no objection to that.

Mr. INGALLS. I move to strike out "Interior" and insert "Treasury."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill for the relief of William L. Hickam, of Missouri, the guardian of the minor children of Hillary J. Jenkins."

ENLISTMENTS OF COLORED SOLDIERS.

Mr. BURNSIDE. I desire to call up a bill which has been a special order on the Calendar for some time, the bill (S. No. 178) to remove all restrictions now existing in regard to enlistments of the colored citizen in any arm of the United States Army. I move to take it up.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Military Affairs with amendments.

The first amendment was to strike out section 1, in the following words:

That hereafter the word "color" shall not be used to designate any soldier of the United States Army; that the colored citizen shall be entitled to all privileges and rights of any citizen to enlist in any arm of the United States Army, and no distinction shall hereafter be made in the assignment of the soldier on account of color or previous descent; that all arms of the service, engineers, artillery, cavalry, infantry, signal corps, irrespective of color, shall be open to him.

And in lieu thereof to insert:

That sections 1104 and 1108 of the Revised Statutes be, and the same are hereby, repealed.

The next amendment was to strike out the first paragraph of section 2, in the following words:

SEC. 2. That the President is authorized to fill the Ninth and Tenth Cavalry, Twenty-fourth and Twenty-fifth Infantry, with enlisted men without reference or distinction of color; that he shall use his discretion in keeping these regiments above the minimum strength required by law, assigning men from the general recruiting and general mounted service as they are required by the regiments, without regard to color.

The next amendment was in the beginning of line 8 of section 2 to strike out the word "and" and insert "that;" so as to read:

That nothing in the above act shall be so construed that the Ninth and Tenth Cavalry, Twenty-fourth and Twenty-fifth Infantry, are not part of the United States Army.

Mr. INGALLS. I hope we shall hear some explanation of this bill before we are called upon to vote on it.

Mr. BURNSIDE. The first section of this bill as originally offered by me reads as follows:

That hereafter the word "color" shall not be used to designate any soldier of the United States Army; that the colored citizen shall be entitled to all privileges and rights of any citizen to enlist in any arm of the United States Army, and no distinction shall hereafter be made in the assignment of the soldier on account of color or previous descent; that all arms of the service, engineers, artillery, cavalry, infantry, signal corps, irrespective of color, shall be open to him.

And the second section reads as follows:

SEC. 2. That the President is authorized to fill the Ninth and Tenth Cavalry, Twenty-fourth and Twenty-fifth Infantry, with enlisted men without reference or distinction of color; that he shall use his discretion in keeping these regiments above the minimum strength required by law, assigning men from the general recruiting and general mounted service as they are required by the regiments, without regard to color.

And nothing in the above act shall be so construed that the Ninth and Tenth Cavalry, Twenty-fourth and Twenty-fifth Infantry, are not part of the United States Army.

Upon examination it was found that the purposes of the bill could be accomplished by the repeal of sections 1104 and 1108 of the Revised Statutes; so the Military Committee recommend striking out all of the first and second sections after the enacting clause and inserting in lieu thereof the following:

That sections 1104 and 1105 of the Revised Statutes be, and the same are hereby repealed.

They read as follows:

SEC. 1104. The enlisted men of two regiments of cavalry shall be colored men.

SEC. 1105. The enlisted men of two regiments of infantry shall be colored men. These two sections, Mr. President, are the only ones in the Revised Statutes which in any way affect the rights of colored men. It may be said that they in no way restrict their rights, that all arms of the service are open for their enlistment, because nothing in the statutes forbids it; but in point of fact they are not enlisted for any other regiments than the four referred to, and the implication is fair as long as these two sections remain on the statute-book that all arms of the service are closed to colored men except the infantry and cavalry, and that in those arms their enlistment is confined to these four regiments referred to by these sections.

Now, Mr. President, the position of an enlisted soldier in the United States Army is the only position not freely open to our colored citizens, and I can see no reason why they should not be as free in this respect as in all others. If the colored people are fit for soldiers at all they should be enlisted for any duty for which they may be personally qualified, and assigned to the corps when the public interests require their services. The mode of assignment should be left to the Secretary of War and the officers of the Army properly intrusted with such duties. It would be a waste of time after all the discussion of past years in reference to the rights of the colored people to enter into an elaborate argument to prove that they have the same rights of enlistment and assignment as other citizens. It is objected that the mingling of colored soldiers with white ones would be a hardship to the whites. I can see no justice in this argument. If it is a hardship to the white citizens of our country to associate with the colored citizens in the performance of public duties and if the rights of colored men are to be restricted, then the rule should apply to all public positions. The right to go to the polls, the right to hold State and national offices, the right to occupy a seat upon this floor, the right to occupy the presidential chair should rest in the white man. What would be thought of a statute which required that four specified States should be represented by colored Senators, particularly if by implication it took from the other States the right to send colored Senators? We have upon this floor an honored representative of the colored race, who is respected by all of us and with whom we are all glad to be associated; but he does not come here because of a law requiring that Mississippi should send a colored Senator. He is here because his fellow-citizens of that State have honored him by their free suffrages. Any other State in this Union can send here a colored Senator, and if he conducts himself honorably and properly he will be respected.

The right to enlist in the naval service of the United States has always rested with the colored people, and there is no disposition on the part of the naval officers to have that right restricted.

I grant, Mr. President, that there is a division of opinion in the Army upon the question of enlisting colored men in the Army; I mean upon the subject of mixing the white and colored men in the same regiment; but there is no difference of opinion as to the lack of wisdom in the present organization of the four regiments referred to in this bill. The General of the Army and the general officers in command of the departments in which these regiments serve agree in the opinion that the present system of enlisting colored men is bad. Among the evils of the present organization of these regiments is the great difficulty at times in keeping their ranks filled. Just now there is great trouble in getting colored recruits, so that the ranks of the colored cavalry regiment in New Mexico are but half filled, and, although white recruits are abundant, they cannot be assigned to this regiment.

But, Mr. President, I base my argument in this matter upon the high ground that the colored man should be allowed to enlist in any arm of the service he may choose, if he is found by the recruiting officer to be a suitable man, and that he should be assigned by the proper authorities to the corps for which he is best suited and in which his services will most conduce to the public good.

Mr. MAXEY. Mr. President, I was one of the members of the Committee on Military Affairs who dissented from the report of this bill, and it is but just to myself that I should give the reason which caused me to do so.

Under the law as it now stands, the Ninth and Tenth Regiments of Cavalry and the Twenty-fourth and Twenty-fifth Regiments of Infantry are required to be made up of colored troops. That act was doubtless carefully considered and thought to be a protection of the right of the colored people to enter the Army and at the same time a protection to the rights of the white recruits.

Mr. INGALLS. I would like to ask the Senator from Texas a question. Why cannot colored troops enlist in the Army without sections 1104 and 1105 of the Revised Statutes?

Mr. MAXEY. Before replying to the question I will finish what I began to say. The effect of this bill is to my mind a question of very great doubt. It is unquestionably the duty of the recruiting officer to select, without the slightest regard to color, the very best possible material that can be obtained for soldiers in the Army of the United States. There can be no question about that. If the white man is the better man for the service, the white man should be selected; if the colored man is the better man for the service, the colored man should be selected. The best recruits that can be obtained for the service of the United States should be obtained by the recruiting officer.

The effect of mixing up white troops and colored troops in the same companies and the same regiments is, to my mind, of doubtful propriety. We know as a practical fact that there is a certain amount of what a great many persons see proper to call prejudice existing between the races; and when you take white troops and colored troops and mix them in the same companies, at the same messes, in the same tents, it is a very grave question whether or not the effect of that would not be to demoralize the entire Army.

Now, in reply to the question which was asked by the Senator from Kansas, were these sections stricken out what would prevent colored troops being enlisted in any of the regiments? I infer that the Senator refers to rights under the fourteenth amendment. My judgment about that is that enlistment is controlled by the clause of the Constitution which grants to Congress the power "to make rules for the government and regulation of the land and naval forces," and whatever may be considered by Congress as the better rules and better regulations Congress has a right to adopt. In the Engineer Corps, for example, a certain class of soldiers is required with certain acquirements not required of those in the other branches of the service. The rules and regulations are prescribed by Congress for the government of the Army and Navy, and if Congress believes that it would be a better rule and better regulation to keep the colored troops in regiments by themselves, I know of nothing in the spirit or letter of the Constitution which would prevent Congress from prescribing those rules and regulations; and I apprehend, without knowing, that that was the principle which actuated Congress when they adopted the law as it now stands.

Mr. ALLISON. But what is there now, may I ask the Senator, in the law to prevent colored men from being enlisted in other regiments than those specifically mentioned in the last section of this bill? What is there in the law that prohibits that?

Mr. MAXEY. There may be nothing in the strict letter of the law; I am not sure of that; but certainly there is in the spirit of that law as it has been construed by the recruiting officers of the Army. They have construed that act to mean that the colored recruits are to go to the Ninth and Tenth Cavalry and to the Twenty-fourth and Twenty-fifth Infantry, and no recruits have been sent to any one of the remaining eight regiments of cavalry or twenty-three regiments of infantry, save white recruits. That has been the construction, believed doubtless by the recruiting officers of the Army, and sustained by the Secretary of War and the General of the Army, to be a correct construction of the spirit of this act of Congress, which did specifically prescribe that these four regiments—two of the cavalry and two of infantry—should be filled up with colored troops, and I think this the correct construction.

Mr. INGALLS. Does not the Senator from Texas think that if this bill became a law it would result in the absolute exclusion of all colored soldiers from the Army?

Mr. MAXEY. That has been the very grave question to my mind as to what would be the effect. As I stated before, I am in favor of taking the very best recruits that can be obtained for the service; I believe the white troops to be the best; and if I were a recruiting officer I would without hesitation, not regarding it as a question of color at all but regarding it as a question of duty, select white troops because I believe them to be the best. If that construction were placed upon the law by the recruiting officers, my judgment is if the Senator desires my judgment about it, that you would have the Ninth and Tenth Regiments of cavalry and the Twenty-fourth and Twenty-fifth Regiments of infantry better than they are now. That is my judgment; but it is the fear which I have as to how this bill if passed as presented by the Senator from Rhode Island may be carried out by the recruiting officers that occasions me the slightest doubt as to my course. If I believed it would result in converting these two regiments of cavalry and two of infantry into good white regiments, the service would be bettered. On the contrary—and it is a very doubtful question as the Senator must see—if the effect of it would be to put colored troops all through the Army in all the various messes, companies, and regiments, in my judgment it would be exceedingly dangerous and demoralizing to the entire Army. It is a very grave question presenting two sides, and I have endeavored candidly to present it. If I believed it would have one effect, the ultimate replacement of the Ninth and Tenth Cavalry with white troops, because the best, I should certainly vote for it; if on the other hand it would have the other effect, I am against it.

I beg not to be misunderstood. Under the fourteenth amendment all persons born or naturalized in the United States, and subject to their jurisdiction, are citizens of the United States, but the halt, the lame, and the blind cannot, because citizens, claim entry into the Army. The recruiting officer looks under the Constitution and laws to that class of citizens which will make the best soldiers, without regard to nationality or previous condition. I believe the white man makes the best soldier.

Mr. ALLISON. I should like to ask the Senator from Rhode Island a question. If I understood his remarks on this bill aright, the effect would be precisely what is feared by the Senator from Texas, namely, that all the regiments will be opened up to the enlistment of the colored troops. That I understand to be the object of the Senator from Rhode Island.

Mr. BURNSIDE. That is the object of the bill.

Mr. ALLISON. If that is the real object of the bill, then I suggest that it can be reached much more certainly and simply by providing that colored troops shall be enlisted in all the regiments. Then the Senator from Texas will have no doubt as to what the future effect of the bill will be, and it will carry out precisely the object of the majority of the committee; but as it is now I think it is open to the objection made by the Senator from Texas, namely, if it is construed one way it will exclude colored troops entirely from the Army, and he says that is the way he would like to have it construed; and if it is construed the other way, of course the Senator from Texas would not be pleased. If I understand the Senator from Texas, his object is to break up practically the four colored regiments that are now in the Army and to substitute in the place of those colored men white troops.

Mr. MAXEY. And for the reason—

Mr. ALLISON. You gave the reason.

Mr. MAXEY. Not on account of color, but because they are better troops.

Mr. ALLISON. You want more efficient troops. That is a question of fact on which I might differ very much with the Senator from Texas.

Mr. BURNSIDE. The Senator from Texas, of course, has his own reasons for acting as he proposes to do on this bill. I have my own reasons for desiring its passage, and I have stated them to the Senate. My purpose is to remove a restriction which rests upon the colored people of the country. A colored man now cannot enlist in the Engineer Corps; he cannot enlist in the artillery; he cannot enlist in any of the regiments of infantry except the two mentioned, nor in any of the regiments of cavalry except the two mentioned. My object is to open all the arms of the service to the enlistment of colored troops.

I do not mean to say that this is going to put a sprinkling of colored troops in all the regiments of the Army of the United States within six months or within a year, possibly not within six years; but a process is going on in the United States which makes it very clear to me that there will be a sprinkling of colored troops in all the arms of the military service in a very few years. The prejudices of our people are being overcome every day. You may enact laws "until the cows come home," and you cannot remove these prejudices by those laws alone; the people themselves have got to become intelligent and unprejudiced, and they will become so on this subject within a very short time, and we shall have colored troops—and efficient colored troops—in all the regiments of the service. Men will sit down at the mess-table with colored troops, just as I sit down now in the omnibus and the horse-car with the colored man, and just as I sit by him in other places where he could not have sat by me six or ten or twelve years ago. All of our people are overcoming these prejudices.

I based my argument on the broad ground that there should be no restriction. If we were to pass here to-day a law in the terms suggested by the Senator from Iowa, that colored troops shall be enlisted in all the regiments, there would be the same reason for passing a law that Germans should be enlisted in all the regiments, that Irishmen should be enlisted in all the regiments, or that native American citizens should be enlisted in all the regiments. I see no more reason for the one provision than the other as a positive requirement of law.

Mr. ALLISON. The Senator will pardon me a moment. As I understand the construction now given to the law by the officers of the Army, colored troops are enlisted only in certain regiments. Now, the way to remedy that is to remove the restriction simply, so that they may be enlisted in all the other regiments.

Mr. BURNSIDE. In my remarks I made the very suggestion the Senator from Iowa has now made; but they have the right now to offer for enlistment in all the regiments, and the recruiting officers have the right to enlist them, but by implication their enlistment is confined to these four regiments because the law says these four regiments shall be composed of colored men and colored men exclusively. I say it is a wrong upon the white man to declare by law that he shall not enlist in the Ninth Regiment of Cavalry. Suppose some intelligent, respectable white man from the locality of that regiment wants to enlist in it to serve three years; he comes up and says "I want to enlist as a soldier in the Ninth Cavalry;" the recruiting officer says "You cannot be received." "Why?" "Because you are a white man." The whole thing is unjust on its face. If our Army is in such a condition, if our people are in such a condition that they will not enlist in the same regiment with a colored man, that is something which we cannot meet by law; but I do not think that is the case—

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The morning hour has expired.

Mr. BURNSIDE. I can see nothing in the suggestion of the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I suggest that the Senator from Rhode Island be allowed to finish his observations.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. BURNSIDE. I have no more to say unless something be said by others in opposition to the bill.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I should like to ask the Senator, though I do not want to take up time, what is the object of this amendment? His original bill as it stood, affirmatively declared that distinction in enlistment into the Army should not be made on the ground of color. That is right; that is the Constitution in its true sense I think; but now the committee has struck that all out and simply repealed two sections of the Revised Statutes which declare that there shall be two regiments of colored infantry and two regiments of colored cavalry, leaving the rest of the law just as it stands on the statute-book. The consequence is that the law which now compels the enlistment of four colored regiments is repealed, and the law is left under the interpretation—a wrong one in my opinion—that is said to have been given to it, that does not admit colored troops into any regiment at all. I think the Senator, if he is desirous to accomplish what I am sure he does, had better stick to his original bill. I should be very much afraid of the amendment.

Mr. BURNSIDE. I certainly have no objection to the original bill. I made this report myself. I do not know that it will be objected to in the committee.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The morning hour has expired, and the bill goes over.

Mr. BURNSIDE. I move that this bill be recommitted to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair hears no objection to entertaining that motion.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. BLAINE. Suppose you take the bill as reported and add to it—And hereafter colored men shall have the right to enlist in all arms of the service.

Mr. ALLISON. That will do.

Mr. BURNSIDE. Under the law they have that right, but we have in the statute-book two sections which restrict that right by implication only. Now, there is no reason why those sections should be on the statute-book, and I simply wanted to save time and trouble by recommending their repeal; but I have no objection to the bill going back to the committee.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill has been recommitted to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. BLAINE. I ask to have my amendment committed with the bill to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. That course will be taken. The amendment will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to add to the amendment of the Committee on Military Affairs:

And hereafter colored men shall have full right to enlist in all the arms of the service.

Mr. BURNSIDE. If I can have the consent of the Senate to finish this bill, I will say now that I accept the amendment so that we can have the action of the Senate upon it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. WHYTE. I object.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The unfinished business is before the Senate, on which the Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL] is entitled to the floor.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. MITCHELL. Will the Senator from Vermont yield to me for a moment for a personal explanation?

Mr. MORRILL. Certainly.

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, yesterday, under instructions of the Committee on Railroads, I reported an amendment in the nature of a substitute to the bill authorizing the extension of time for the completion of the Northern Pacific Railroad, and also submitted a report under instructions of the committee. At the time I did so the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. WINDOM] asked leave to submit a minority report, to which there was no objection and leave was granted. Subsequently, under the head of "Bills introduced"—I happened to be temporarily absent in the cloak-room—the Senator from Minnesota introduced a bill on the same subject, a bill providing for the extension of time to the Northern Pacific Railroad, and, as is usual on the introduction of a bill, it was referred at his instance to the committee designated by him, which in that case was the Committee on Public Lands. As I say, I happened to be absent in the cloak-room and had no knowledge of this until late in the afternoon yesterday. I only desire to call attention to the matter now, because it strikes me that the course taken was, to say the least, a very extraordinary one, that after the appropriate committee—and certainly the Committee on Railroads was the appropriate committee to consider that subject—had, upon a careful and thorough investigation of some two or three months, considered the whole subject and made a report with but one dissenting voice from the committee, then a bill on the same subject should be introduced and referred to another committee, not the appropriate committee in my judgment to consider the matter. I simply desire to call the attention of the Committee on Public Lands to the history of the proceeding, so that when they come to consider that bill they may understand the whole history of the case.

Mr. WINDOM. I was not aware that I was violating any rule of the Senate or was guilty of any impropriety in making this reference.

Mr. MITCHELL. I did not intimate that the Senator from Minnesota had violated any rule of the Senate, but I did intimate and do say that the course taken by him was, to say the least, a very extraordinary and unusual course.

Mr. WINDOM. Nor was I aware that it was so very extraordinary.

If I were to deal in terms that are not quite parliamentary, I should say the course taken by the honorable Senator in the Committee on Railroads was very extraordinary; but I shall not apply the language to him which he has applied to me.

Mr. MITCHELL. What does the Senator refer to, if he charges that I took a very extraordinary course in the Committee on Railroads?

Mr. WINDOM. I think it is not proper now to state it.

Mr. MITCHELL. Very well; the accusation is made, and I should like to know what it is. I am ready to meet any accusation of that kind made by the Senator from Minnesota or any other Senator.

Mr. WINDOM. One thing I say is extraordinary, and I will state what it is. The Senator says there was but one dissenting voice to the bill which he reported.

Mr. MITCHELL. And that is the fact.

Mr. WINDOM. I happen to know that there were at least three dissenting voices in the committee. I do not know whether the Senator knows it or not. I know that fact.

Mr. MITCHELL. The Senator will allow me. There was but one dissenting voice. I do not know that that was material. There are nine members of the committee, as long as the Senator has referred to that.

Mr. WINDOM. The Senator from Oregon referred to it first or I should not have done so.

Mr. MITCHELL. I referred to what took place in the Senate. I referred not to what took place in committee, because I knew it was improper to do so. I simply referred to the fact that the honorable Senator from Minnesota had asked leave to make a minority report, and that that was granted him, which was all proper. I will say, however, that the records of the committee will not bear out the statement made by the Senator from Minnesota, neither will the facts.

Mr. WINDOM. I shall not discuss what occurred in the Senator's committee. I am entirely willing to leave that to the recollection of members of the committee themselves, as to which of us is right on that subject.

Now, as to the reference of the other bill to the Committee on Public Lands, I can see no impropriety in it whatever. I think that committee may very fairly and very properly take the matter into consideration. In the first place it is certainly a committee to whom the matters relating to public lands should be referred. They understand that subject as well as anybody else. It is a committee that I take it will examine that bill without any prejudices but that will give us a fair report upon it, and that is all we want.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. GEORGE M. ADAMS, its Clerk, announced that the House had agreed to the sixth and ninth amendments and disagreed to the other amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 3102) authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to employ temporary clerks, and making an appropriation for the same; also making an appropriation for detecting trespass on public lands, and for bringing into market public lands in certain States, and for other purposes.

The message also announced that the House had passed the following bills; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. No. 1271) establishing the salaries to be paid the collectors of customs of Plymouth and Nantucket, Massachusetts; and

A bill (H. R. No. 3123) extending the privileges of sections 2990 to 2997 of the Revised Statutes, inclusive, to the port of Bath, in the State of Maine.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled joint resolution (H. R. No. 142) making an appropriation for filling up, draining, and placing in good sanitary condition the grounds south of the Capitol along the line of the old canal, and for other purposes; and it was thereupon signed by the Vice-President.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVAL.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. O. L. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries, announced that the President had this day approved and signed the act (S. No. 528) to authorize the Worthington and Sioux Falls Railroad Company to extend its road into the Territory of Dakota to the village of Sioux Falls.

THE PACIFIC RAILROADS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. No. 15) to alter and amend the act entitled "An act to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from the Missouri River to the Pacific Ocean, and to secure to the Government the use of the same for postal, military, and other purposes," approved July 1, 1862, and also to alter and amend the act of Congress approved July 2, 1864, in amendment of said first-named act, the pending question being on the amendment submitted by Mr. MATTHEWS.

Mr. MORRILL. Mr. President, the interests involved in the pending bills relating to the Pacific railroads are of such extraordinary magnitude that it is not astonishing that they have attracted the attention of more than one standing committee of the Senate. The legal and financial problems presented, even after the most elaborate study, seem to afford the basis of widely different conclusions. My own conclusion will be very briefly stated, and it is that we should exercise our right, imbedded in the statutes, to "add to, alter, amend, or repeal" the charters of these companies in such a manner as not to destroy but to preserve this great thoroughfare forever for the use of the public, for the reimbursement of the United States to the full extent of its investments therein, and also for the permanent preservation of the property of the stockholders.

Can all this be harmoniously accomplished? This must be answered in the negative if the policy pursued by either the United States or the stockholders shall be to snatch all the current earnings of the companies for the next twenty years, and then leave the rest to the tender mercies of railroad wreckers. But, by a more far-sighted policy, it seems to me that the rights of all parties, moderately asserted, can be secured and the great highway thus be handed down to future generations as a public blessing, earning perennial dividends for those who may succeed to its ownership, and without fear of fore-ordained bankruptcy from excessive indebtedness.

Sound policy would seem to dictate that the United States should be a liberal rather than a harsh creditor, but not a weak nor a silly one; and that policy equally dictates that the stockholders should not be too eager for present profits; that they should forego something of immediate gains in order to preserve a long and prosperous life to their companies, and therefore that they should be willing to postpone something of fat dividends in order to diminish an indebtedness which threatens their ultimate extinction. If the vitality of the road and its obligations can be destroyed by extravagant demands on the part of the United States, it is not less certain that a continuance of the past omission on the part of these companies to provide for any reduction of their colossal indebtedness will, in twenty years, make both their present valuable capital stock, and the second mortgage of very doubtful value and possibly utterly worthless. The bare interest upon the first and second mortgages will become so ponderous and unmanageable as to swallow up all the net earnings, and from sheer necessity the property must then be foreclosed by the first-mortgage bondholders. The United States, holding the second mortgage, as a last resort, for its own protection, may be compelled to pay off the first mortgage, amounting to $57,062,192, and take the slender chances of realizing any ultimate repayment; but the capital stock of the companies would be extinguished. Of course, should the United States not intervene, and a foreclosure be pushed by the first-mortgage bondholders, many of whom are present holders of stock, the first mortgagees would become the sole owners of the whole property, and any other lien would be forever barred.

I do not propose to consider at any length the legal questions arising in the bills which are pending, but I may be permitted to say that where the right has been reserved in terms of the most radical latitude by Congress to "add to, alter, amend, or repeal" a charter granted, it would seem that Congress, beyond all controversy, must have the whole of that right, with no great limitation to its exercise save the discretion of Congress itself. The party with whom discretion is lodged must use it and no other. "To add to, alter, amend, or repeal," were each and all exclusive rights reserved to Congress and not to the courts nor to the companies. Of course I do not mean to say that Congress can annul gifts or disturb the past; but it may regulate the future and may interdict gifts made at our expense, may reform abuses, and impose any additional safeguards upon the proper administration of the trust at its will and pleasure. Undoubtedly the Supreme Court disappointed some members of Congress—perhaps with sufficient reasons—by its decision that the interest paid by the United States annually on account of these railroad companies was a debt not due until the principal of the debt became due, or thirty years after the date of the bonds; but I do not understand that the Supreme Court have decided that upon these large sums, greater much than the face of the bonds, no interest will be due and chargeable when the principal of the bonds becomes due; nor do I understand, whether that be so or not, that the Supreme Court have decided anything only on the basis of the law as it stood at the time of the decision; and should the law be altered or amended by the legislative branch of the Government, with the approval of the Executive, it would be a gross mistake for any party to hope or expect any subsequent decision of the judiciary could be based upon anything but the law as amended.

If the power of Congress to touch these corporations were even held to rest upon the technical grounds of some default on the part of these companies, can it be said that they have been so clear in their great office as to be void of all offense? Has there been no default in the prompt payment of the 5 per cent. of their net earnings? Is it no default that they have received and issued, as has been often stoutly asserted, beyond the bonds of the United States to the extreme legal limit, their own first-mortgage bonds in excess of the amount actually required for the construction of the road, and have distributed the proceeds of this excess as though it were legitimate profits from earnings of the road—an excess, also, which must at once ascend into the bosom of the first mortgage to the prejudice and manifest detriment of the security of the United States? I do not know what the facts may be, but the charge has been made as I have stated it. Their grand subsidy was granted to secure the construction of the road, and we never contemplated an additional thirty years' tax upon our people to enable the companies to distribute munificent dividends upon unpaid-for stock. Is it no default, that the law, which required the capital stock to be paid for in money at par, was notoriously disregarded?

Is it not some default that these companies have been long and regularly distributing larger dividends than they could have done except by the postponement of the repayment of the large sums paid out semi-annually on their account by the United States, and thereby steadily increasing their own indebtedness? Is it possible that there is no legal remedy for a policy of "stripping and waste" in the open and defiant grasp of dividends steadily derived from the United States Treasury to the amount of $3,423,731 annually? Cannot Congress say that dividends must cease until they can be made without an increase of liabilities? Cannot Congress meet the exigency of impending insolvency by an adequate remedy?

In the case of the Central Pacific, their resources, including those of this indirect character, have been equal not only to 8 per cent. dividends, but they have a surplus of over $10,000,000 with which they are said to be extending a monopoly by building another trans-continental railroad, upon which the United States will have neither first nor second mortgage security. With such an exuberance of means it would seem that running hopelessly in debt to the United States was wholly inexcusable, and, if they so persisted, that it would be such evidence of a purpose to incapacitate themselves for the future repayment of the debt as to justify a prompt and vigorous interference.

The original intention of the acts of Congress must be carried out; and that intention was, that the companies, if able, were to honestly pay honest debts. No one proposes to take from them an acre of granted land. No one at present proposes to interfere with their rates of freight and transportation. No one proposes to add to the number of Government directors. No one proposes to restore our second mortgage to the position it originally held as the first lien. No one proposes to reclaim the rich and extensive coal-fields. No one proposes to divert a dollar of the earnings of the road to any other use than to the strict and direct lasting benefit of the road; that is to say, to the ultimate extinction of some share of the rapidly accumulating debts of the companies. It seems to me that so far this would not be oppressive. What prudently managed corporation would not eagerly do the same thing? It would be but a slight change in the practical economy of the railroad companies, and such as might often result from a mere change in a board of directors. It is not a change of what is called the contract that is desired, but it is to ward off a fatal change threatened by the railroad companies, through a wrong and blindly selfish administration of their affairs, that is sought to be arrested. Unless the present stockholders regard a twenty years lease of the Pacific Railroad as more valuable than its ultimate perpetual ownership, free from debt, they cannot look with disfavor upon any measure calculated to diminish their indebtedness and to give them an unnumbered title to their property.

By the sixth section of the act of 1862 it is quite obvious that a greater payment than for services to the Government and 5 per cent. of the net earnings were contemplated, as will be seen from the following words:

Said company may also pay the United States, wholly or in part, in the same or other bonds, Treasury notes, or other evidences of debt against the United States, to be allowed at par.

But still more significant are the words which follow, by which it appears that 5 per cent. of the net earnings was only fixed as a minimum, as "the least" that should be paid, and that they might be required to pay, or might voluntarily pay, much more. The concluding part of the section reads as follows:

And after said road is completed, until said bonds and interest are paid, at least 5 per cent. of the net earnings of said road shall be annually applied to the payment thereof.

This lets in a flood of light and shows that from the net earnings to be annually applied to the payment of the bonds, as well as the interest, 5 per cent. was not to be anything more than "the least" that should be required.

As to the question of the power of Congress to pass the bill of the Judiciary Committee or that of the Railroad Committee, there is this difference in principle, that the latter bill assumes that Congress has no power to legislate upon the subject but with the consent of the railroad companies or that we are wholly at their mercy. That bill appears to have been projected upon the idea of making the consent of the companies certain by giving them better conditions than they now enjoy. The interests of the United States appear to me to be of sufficient magnitude to warrant Congress in claiming to be at least an equal party and not inferior to the railroad companies in the determination of the questions at issue. The bill of the Judiciary Committee assumes so much, perhaps rather more, and asks no questions.

For one, I would not use the power of Congress tyrannically, nor unjustly; but this power will be evoked when extravagant claims are presented, no matter by what astute argumentation they may be enforced; no matter how potential may be the array of private interests; and the managers of these roads, if they do not want their affairs, at some cost to themselves, perpetually sweltering in the Halls of Congress, should comprehend the point clearly, and promptly tender or accept such fair and equitable terms as would be ratified and confirmed forever by the people, and such as the railroad companies, upon "second sober thought," would cheerfully accept. Great benefits were originally expected from the road, and these, let us cheerfully admit, have been realized in far cheaper transportation service and in the stronger ligament which binds the shores of the Atlantic and Pacific together; but these benefits were the inducements prophesied, which called forth unstinted liberality in advance, and there can be no well-founded demand for compensation a second time.

Have we been liberal or not with the Pacific Railroad Companies? By looking at what has been done, all can better judge what more should be done.

First. We have given to them, as estimated at different times by the General Land Office, from twenty million to thirty million acres of public lands, not wholly of much present value, but with abundant coal-fields of priceless value, exceeding even the inexhaustible anthracite-coal fields of Pennsylvania, and affording a large and marketable product as well as a supreme element in the cheap operation of the road.

Second. We aided by lending the companies our 6 per cent. bonds for thirty years to the amount of $57,062,192, secured at the outset by a first mortgage, and these bonds now bring in the market over 18 per cent. premium. We gave our security and took theirs to cover an exactly equal amount.

Third. We consented to change the place of our mortgage security from the first place to that of a subordinate, and gave to the companies the privilege of issuing an equal amount with a prior lien.

Fourth. The whole of their charges for services in carrying the mails and other transportation accounts by the act of 1862 were to be at once applied on their indebtedness, but by the act of 1864 only one-half was to be so applied.

Fifth. In the first act all coal-mines were reserved to the United States, but in the last they were wholly surrendered to the railroads.

Sixth. We have thus far paid the accruing interest on the second-mortgage bonds (less the amount reimbursed) to the extent of $24,343,712.36. We must continue the payment of this interest as it falls due for twenty years longer, or a further sum of $66,110,620.40. Nothing of this will be due, according to the decision of the Supreme Court, until the principal is due. Simple interest upon these payments at 6 per cent. will amount to nearly or quite $70,000,000. If this also is not a debt, when we are paying 6 per cent. upon a loan of millions, then it is a gratuity largely in excess of the original bonds, and one of those things never dreamed of in the philosophy of Congress.

The account stated as between merchant and merchant, or between man and man, would show that besides lands, besides coal-mines, besides credits, up to the year 1900, we shall have aided these companies, as already indicated, to the extent of not less than $217,516,624.76. From this sum there should be deducted whatever sum has or shall have been repaid; but, if that should reach no higher figure than for the past ten years, it will be comparatively rather insignificant in amount. Through the aid of the United States these companies have issued certificates of stock representing for the Union Pacific, $36,762,300, and for the Central Pacific, $54,275,500, or $91,037,800 of capital in all, upon which it would be a preposterous exaggeration to suppose that even 10 per cent. was ever paid at par in cash as capital; and upon this very rotund fiction the fortunate stockholders have been receiving dividends just the same as they would have done on a capital fully paid up at one hundred cents on the dollar. And yet, my friend the Senator from Ohio [Mr. MATTHEWS] is eloquently distressed at the idea of interference by Congress at any time before the dividends shall exceed 10 per cent. when, if they were to be restricted to 10 per cent. dividends upon the cash originally actually paid for each share of stock, one dollar per share instead of ten would be altogether too much for even a 10 per cent. dividend.

Here is where, as I think, there is fair ground for an equitable arrangement between the United States and the managers of these gigantic corporations. The stockholders must see that it will be for their interest in the long run to accept smaller dividends rather than to receive larger at the risk and cost of the United States, already perhaps an exasperated creditor. They might distribute 4 or possibly even 6 per cent. dividends and preserve their plant. Six dollars annually on shares costing even sixty or seventy dollars ought to make the owners contented. They have their choice: big dividends absolutely terminable after a brief period, or moderate dividends for a brief period and then larger ones in perpetuity. The Union pays 8 per cent. and the Central 8 per cent., with a very heavy and increasing surplus. The net earnings of the Union, after deducting operating expenses, in 1877 were $4,317,091.58, and those of the Central in 1876 were $9,137,004.73. Such a net revenue makes its own argument.

I know that some considerable part of these stocks have passed from the hands of the original owners, and now brings in market about $70 per share for the Union and a good deal more than that for the stock of the Central, which, being owned by a small number of individuals, is rarely offered for sale, and yet ere long I fancy, even with dividends temporarily reduced, the stock of both companies would take its place, without a peer, as the best among all American railroad stocks. The through business has by no means yet reached its maximum, and the local business, along with the rapidly increasing local population, may be expected to double within a brief time after the country shall have once more arrived at the condition of its usual prosperity. I have no doubt these companies will be able to contribute liberally to a sinking fund, and still make sure and respectable dividends, or with so little diminution as to cause only a slight and temporary depression in the price of their stock. They have been exceptionally successful and can afford, while mainly holding a stock with all the earmarks of a bonus, to be just toward a benefactor to whom they are indebted for fortunes of many millions, possibly too blindly bestowed.

But what is it that the bill of the Railroad Committee proposes to do, and which has been urged with so much pertinacity?

First. They propose that the United States shall pay, as we have paid, the coupon interest, and wait without interest until the whole debt matures.

Second. Instead of applying to their credit annually, as the law now compels them to do, the pledged 5 per cent. of their net earnings and the one-half of the transportation accounts against the Government, they propose to add 6 per cent. interest, compounded semi-annually, to the several sums, though the largest would be interest on the actual money of the Government, and then twenty years hence to apply it with all the accretions to their credit. With that method of borrowing and of payment, fat dividends might be paid by the railroads without any other business, although it would be much simpler and far more advantageous to the United States to provide that for every dollar paid by the railroad companies they should have a credit of $2.

By the mode of computation proposed the compensation for Government services to the amount of say $600,000 in 1876 would entitle the railroads in the year 1900 to an inflated credit of more than four times that amount, or to $2,479,350.92, being $1,879,350.92 in excess of what they would be entitled to under existing law. This is not wiping out their debt with a sponge, but it is the mode of wiping it out by the bill of the Railroad Committee, and entirely a new and rare gift to the companies. The Senator from Ohio on my right [Mr. MATTHEWS] has no doubt they will accept of it. It being a new and very large subsidy, I do not think he is any too confident.

Third. It is finally proposed that the railroad companies shall add to the 5 per cent. of net earnings and to the Government transportation account a sum sufficient to make altogether an annual contribution to the sinking fund of $1,000,000, but the addition would be a supplement insufficient to offset the magnificent railroad arithmetic. The addition is a cipher only, but serves the magical purpose of hugely multiplying their credits.

It will be seen that the chief merit of this sinking fund is its semi-annual compound-interest fertility, while the semi-annual advances made by the United States are to be absolutely barren of interest. It is a new way of paying debts, by which a mole-hill overtops the mountain, and, if successful, the inventors should be rewarded with a compound-multiplying patent. If the companies are truly too poor ever to repay what they really owe, let us manfully proclaim the fact and release them to the extent of 50 per cent.; but do not let us vainly undertake to befog our constituents nor ourselves with this bald, if not impudent, system of book-keeping and arithmetic, which the merest school-boy would be ashamed not to discover reached a like result by a much less circuitous process.

As I understand it the 5 per cent. on net earnings and one-half of the services for Government transportation by the Union Pacific may be reckoned to average about $666,972. This would leave $166,514 as the pitiful sum to be semi-annually added to the sinking fund to make up the annual amount to one million, and this is the meager outcome of all the new and old advantages so hopefully tendered to the railroad companies. We are to settle and compound our debt and have very little to show for it but the pomp and sublimity of semi-annual compound interest. Beyond these telling advantages, proffered with as lavish a hand as though the railroad was yet un-built, there comes an appendix providing that, after the year 1900, we are to reloan to the railroad companies the same amount of capital for twenty-five years longer, to be repaid semi-annually in half-million installments, with no other nor better security and with the stipulation that no more than the lowest average rate of interest our public debt may then bear shall be exacted. If we should then owe no debt and be paying no interest, the inference might be that no interest could be charged; but with this bill as an example of our guardianship of the financial interests of the country, there need not be much apprehension that the country will be out of debt.

The bill of the Judiciary Committee may need some amendment—something less complicated and more direct might be better—and I should greatly prefer some changes that would, if possible, simplify the various propositions it contains; but I am very clear that the financial position of the United States relative to these railroad companies would not be improved by the passage of the bill of the Railroad Committee, and, rather than accept of its conditions, it would be wiser, as it appears to me, to wait until the managers of these roads—if we cannot act without their consent—find it for their interest to offer better terms. In fact, I cannot persuade myself that any of these managers could, with a sober face, ask those who are here, charged with the duty of protecting the interests of the United States, to vote for the bill of the Railroad Committee, as they must know that the cry for repeal would be sounded before the ink was dry upon the parchment. It may be true that the bill would send them along on the road to Paradise, but it is manifest that the interests of the Government would keep equal pace on the road to ruin.

Finally, if the Pacific Railroad Companies cannot keep their dividends up to the present rate and at the same time diminish their indebtedness, business forecast and reasonable prudence require the directors to make some temporary appropriation to this important end from their dividend funds. Nothing less will answer their purpose nor that of Congress; and perhaps the best thing the railroad companies can now do would be to ask their friends not to identify themselves with a bill which professedly aims to create a sinking fund but which instead proves to be only a mask to hide a fresh subsidy.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President—

Mr. TELLER. I should like to ask the Senator from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL] a question. I understand the Senator from Vermont to find fault with these companies for declaring large dividends on their stock. I would call the attention of the Senator to the eighteenth section of the act of incorporation, wherein it is specially declared that they are entitled to 10 per cent. on the whole cost of the road. I ask the Senator if he claims that that is repealed.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Read the section. Let us hear that special reservation.

Mr. CHRISTIANCY. Read the section, and see how much they are entitled to receive.

Mr. TELLER. The eighteenth section of the act of 1862 provides—

That whenever it appears that the net earnings of the entire road and telegraph, including the amount allowed for services rendered for the United States, after deducting all expenditures—including repairs and the furnishing, running, and managing of said road—shall exceed 10 per cent. upon its cost, (exclusive of the 5 per cent. to be paid to the United States)—

Then the Government may interfere.

Mr. EDMUNDS. May do what?

Mr. TELLER. Then the Government may interfere and fix the rates. That is a tacit declaration, at least, that they are entitled to receive that before the Government can interfere.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Before the Government could fix the rates; but, in the mean time, the Government wants to have this money kept to pay the debt.

Mr. TELLER. That is not the question, and I ask the Senator whether he thinks they are not entitled to dividends on their stock?

Mr. HARRIS. If there be no Senator who desires to continue the debate upon the railroad bill this evening, I move that it be informally laid aside, and that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. No. 855) for the relief of Warren Mitchell.

Mr. THURMAN. I have every disposition in the world to oblige the Senator from Tennessee, but I do hope if Senators wish to speak on the railroad bill that they will proceed. I gave notice last week that I would ask for a vote to-morrow. If I had not given that notice I should ask for a vote to-day. I hope that we may get to a vote; but if we are to have only one speech a day on this bill, and sometimes a very brief one, (as the very brief discussion to which we have listened this morning, and none the less instructive because it was brief,) I do not know when we shall get to a vote upon the bill. I hope, if there is any Senator who is prepared to speak on the bill now and desires to do so, that he will proceed to-day. If he does not, I am sure he cannot complain if to-morrow I ask the Senate, and ask the Senate earnestly, to bring this discussion to a close, and to sit the bill out.

I propose to offer an amendment to the original bill to be considered by the Senate. I believe the bill can only be laid aside informally by unanimous consent.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. (Mr. ROLLINS in the chair.) The Senator from Tennessee asks that the funding bill be informally laid aside, and that the Senate take up for consideration—

Mr. MITCHELL. I suggest to the Senator from Ohio, as he desires to offer an amendment, that it be offered and printed, so that we can understand what it is if the bill is to be laid aside informally.

Mr. THURMAN. I have not the amendment prepared formally, but I can state its substance in a few words, so that the Senate may understand it.

Mr. HARRIS. I submit to the Senator from Ohio that I distinctly stated that, if there was any Senator who desired to continue the debate on the railroad bill this evening, I should not propose to interpose my motion; but, if there be no Senator who desires to be heard this evening upon the railroad bill, then I hope my friend from Ohio will consent that the railroad bill may be informally laid aside and the bill I suggest, Senate bill No. 855, be taken up for consideration.

Mr. THURMAN. Of course, as I gave notice that I should ask a vote to-morrow, I cannot press the bill to a vote to-day. If there is no Senator ready to proceed, of course I shall not resist the motion made by the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. HARRIS. I make the motion indicated a moment since, subject to the wish of any Senator to be heard upon the railroad bill. I shall withdraw the motion instantly if any Senator announces such a purpose.

Mr. INGALLS. I should like to hear the amendment of the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. MITCHELL. I was about to say that if the bill is to go over until to-morrow I should like to hear stated the amendment which the Senator from Ohio proposes.

Mr. THURMAN. I will state now the amendment that I shall offer.

The third section of the Judiciary Committee bill provides as follows:

That there shall be established in the Treasury of the United States a sinking fund, which shall be invested by the Secretary of the Treasury in bonds of the United States; and the semi-annual income thereof shall be in like manner from time to time invested, and the same shall accumulate and be disposed of as hereinafter mentioned. And in making such investments the Secretary shall prefer the 5 per cent. bonds of the United States, unless, for good reasons appearing to him, and which he shall report to Congress, he shall at any time deem it advisable to invest in other bonds of the United States.

In opening the discussion on this bill I explained the reason why the committee directed the Secretary to prefer the 5 per cent. bonds. To repeat, and very briefly, the reasons were that the five percents are the only bonds not subject to call that will mature about the time that the subsidy bonds of the United States will mature, except the subsidy bonds themselves. But we did not think it wise to require the Secretary to invest in the railroad subsidy bonds because of the very high rate of premium that those bonds bear. Therefore we provided that he should give preference in making these investments to the five percents of the United States, especially as the five percents with compound interest upon them will make more interest than the interest which the railroad companies would have to pay upon the same amount of money thus invested at 6 per cent., they paying interest without rest and the five percents being compounded; so that perfect justice would be done to the companies by their investment in the five percents. But it has been suggested to us, and it strikes me with a great deal of force, that the difference between the market value of the first-mortgage bonds of the companies and the five percents is so little that it would be better for the sinking fund to allow the Secretary to invest in the first-mortgage bonds of the companies as well as in Government bonds, because the first-mortgage bonds of the companies bear interest at 6 per cent., whereas the bonds of the United States here mentioned bear interest at only 5 per cent. An investment, therefore, in the first-mortgage bonds would produce 1 per cent. more interest, and compounded it would produce a very considerable amount more interest than an investment in the five percents, while the security for the purposes of the sinking fund would be just as good as would be the five percents or any other bonds of the United States. I therefore give notice that at the proper time I shall move to amend the third section, so as to add the first-mortgage bonds of the companies as one of the securities in which the Secretary may invest the sinking fund.

Mr. MITCHELL. Giving the Secretary of the Treasury discretion to select the five percents of the Government or the 6 per cent. first-mortgage bonds of the companies?

Mr. THURMAN. Yes, the five percents or the first-mortgage bonds of the companies. Of course you have to give the discretion to somebody, and I think that everybody would be willing that it should rest in the Secretary of the Treasury. I have not prepared the amendment in words; it will require some little care, perhaps; but I give notice that I shall move such an amendment at the proper time.

Mr. BLAINE. I should like to ask the Senator from Ohio a question merely for information. In the way the sinking fund is proposed to be constituted in his bill, does it imply or require that the actual investments made shall themselves be retained for this purpose, that it shall be a specific fund, that these specific securities shall be deposited and their interest invested, the specific securities bought to be deposited?

Mr. THURMAN. Undoubtedly it does.

Mr. BLAINE. Suppose any accident or loss should occur to that fund, as occurred in the Interior Department with the Indian trust fund, which has never I believe been made up, upon whom would the loss fall?

Mr. THURMAN. I will say to my friend that we expect to get into power about the 4th of March, 1881, and then everything will be so honestly cared for that there will be no need of apprehension.

Mr. BLAINE. But it was under the Senator's own party that the loss occurred in the Interior Department, and it was just that possible dread that made me address the inquiry to the Senator from Ohio. I believe that nothing of that sort has happened since the republican party came into power, but it did once occur under the democratic party. Seriously, I wanted to know that, because it seemed to me that whatever you agree upon as the rate of the sinking fund the money should be paid in and should be credited to the companies. I do not know that the United States have ever held a sinking fund in any other way. The naval pension fund, which amounts to some $13,000,000 I believe, is not held in any specific bond, nor is the Geneva award fund, I believe, so held now.

Mr. MORRILL. The Geneva award was put in a single bond of the United States.

Mr. BLAINE. Not now, I think.

Mr. MORRILL. It was originally held that way.

Mr. BLAINE. As long as it was in the State Department it was; but it has now been put into the Treasury, I suppose, though the Geneva award fund is not held in specific bonds, and, if any particular bonds happen to be stolen or burned, the Geneva award fund would not be considered to have vanished out of existence.

Mr. THURMAN. If I am not mistaken—the chairman of the Committee on Finance can tell me—the sinking fund of the public debt is held in the very bonds that are purchased.

Mr. MORRILL. No, it is not.

Mr. BLAINE. I think not.

Mr. BECK. They are all canceled.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It is theoretically a specific fund, but practically it is not.
